SECRET OF BEAUTY.

How to Beautify the Complexion.

All women know that it is beauty, rather than genius, which all generations of men have worshipped in the sex. Can it be wondered at, then, that so much of woman's time and attention should be directed to the means of developing and preserving that beauty! The most important adjunct to beauty is a clear, smooth, soft and beautiful skin. With this essential a lady appears handsome, even if her features are not perfect.

Ladies afflicted with Tan, Freckles, Rough or Discolored Skin, should lose no time in procuring and applying

LAIRD'S BLOOM OF YOUTH.

It will immediately obliterate all such imperfections, and is entirely harmless. It has been chemically analyzed by the Board of Health of New York City, and pronounced entirely free from any material injurious to the health or skin.

Over two million ladies have used this delightful toilet preparation, and in every instance it has given entire satisfaction. Ladies, if you desire to be beautiful, give LAIRD'S BLOOM OF YOUTH a trial, and be convinced of its wonderful efficacy. Sold by Fancy Goods Dealers and Druggists everywhere.

Price, 75c. per Bottle. Depot, 83 John St., N. Y.

FAIR FACES,

And fair, in the literal and most pleasing sense, are those kept FRESH and PURE by the use of

BUCHAN'S CARBOLIC TOILET SOAP

This article, which for the past fifteen years has had the commendation of every lady who uses it, is made from the best oils, combined with just the proper amount of glycerine and chemically pure carbolic acid, and is the realization of a PERFECT SOAP.

It will positively keep the skin fresh, clear, and WHITE; removing tan, freckles and discolorations from the skin; healing all eruptions; prevent chapping or roughness; allay irritation and soreness; and overcome all unpleasant effects from perspiration.

Is pleasantly perfumed; and neither when using or afterwards is the slightest odor of the acid perceptible.

BUCHAN'S CARBOLIC DENTAL SOAP

CLEANS and preserves the teeth; cools and refreshes the mouth; sweetens the breath, and is in every way an unrivalled dental preparation.

BUCHAN'S CARBOLIC MEDICINAL SOAP cures all Eruptions and Skin Diseases.

WHIST, —OR— BUMBLEPUPPY?

Ten Lectures addressed to Children.

By PEMBRIDGE.

Also in Lovell's Library, No. 181, - - - .10

“‘WHIST, OR BUMBLEPUPPY?’ is one of the most entertaining and at the same time one of the soundest books on whist ever written. Its drollery may blind some readers to the value of its advice; no man who knows anything about whist, however, will fail to read it with interest, and few will fail to read it with advantage. Upon the ordinary rules of whist, Pembridge supplies much sensible and thoroughly amusing comment. The best player in the world may gain from his observations, and a mediocre player can scarcely find a better counsellor. There is scarcely an opinion expressed with which we do not coincide.”—London Sunday Times.

“We have been rather lengthy in our remarks on this book, as it is the best attempt we have ever seen to shame very bad players into trying to improve, and also because it abounds with most sensible maxims, dressed up in a very amusing and palatable form.”—London Field.

CHAPTER I.

PRELIMINARY WANDERINGS.

MR. PISISTRATUS BROWN, M. P., started for a ramble through the Highlands without any very definite purpose or plan. It was my good fortune to meet him one morning, by the merest accident, in Princes Street, Edinburgh, where he stood on the pavement pensively looking up at the Scott Monument. Even at a distance, I had recognized the plump and comfortable figure of my friend of old, despite the fact that he was now clothed in a suit of gray tartan, with a Glen-garry cap set coquettishly on his head. As I drew near I could perceive that he was little altered—that the old familiar expression was there, which used to puzzle the Conservative benches, and attract the eyes of the reporters from their gallery above. For Mr. Disraeli is not the only member of the House of Commons whom popular imagination has gifted with a “Sphinx-like look.”* Mr. Brown, M. P., has it too. Nature intended the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh to be a jolly, laughing, humorous, and fat little man: but ever after Mr. Brown got into the House, it was observed that a certain gravity lay over his features. He had covered his jocular good-humor with a thin veil of care and thought. He had also caught a trick of passing his hand slowly over his brow, and up toward his shining bald head, as if there was that within which passed the outward show of his round face, and merry, clear blue eyes. Sometimes, indeed, he was found to have his gaze fixed meditatively on the horizon, as if he were resolving within himself the finances of far Cathay, or planning some diplomatic manœuvre in the Khanats, to stem the slow-working stream of Russian aggression.

I asked him how he came to be in Edinburgh while the Houses of Parliament were still sitting. He passed his arm within mine, and said he would tell me.

“You know,” said he, “the Liberal majority is already big enough! What is the use of my remaining in the House to be a mere voting unit? I have stolen away a week or two before the recess in order to do some work which will really be of benefit. I have brought with me a bundle of papers, documents, and letters, bearing on the gross grievances sustained by her Majesty’s Clerks of Customs, as regards salary and term of service; and I humbly think I cannot be better employed than in studying this important question.”

I told Mr. Brown that he was quite right; that it was always better to work in the open air, when that was possible; and then we fell to talking of his projected tour through the Highlands.

It turned out, as I have said, that Mr. Brown, M. P., had no plan; but was not a member of the Imperial Legislature of Great Britain and Ireland certain to have plenty of invitations? In a few days’ time his brethren of both Houses would be coming north; and there would be given him such opportunities of yachting, fishing, deer-stalking, and grouse-shooting, as seldom fall to the lot of mortals. In the mean time he was free to lounge about, and study at his leisure the grievances of the Customs Clerks. I proposed that he should spend a few days in the Western Highlands, before going north. He consented, on condition that I should accompany him. That night we went through to Glasgow, and next morning started by train for Greenock, a beautiful day heralding our setting out.

“Is there a black Macintosh here?” asked the guard, popping his head into the carriage as we were in the bustle of getting out at Greenock.

“No, we are a’ red MacGregors,” was the reply.

This was the last joke we heard from the gay party of artists who had accompanied us from Glasgow—a handful of dare-devil youths, who had smoked, and laughed, and told stories about the "Paisley bodies," and even good-naturedly painted my companion's portrait inside the crown of his hat during the brief ride down from the commercial capital of Scotland. And so we stood upon the quay of Greenock, with all the world before us. In which of all these puffing and roaring steamers should we embark? Far out before us stretched the lake-like Frith of the Clyde—with a brisk breeze from the west curling up its clear waters, with the hills of Roseneath and Cowal lying in a faint haze of heat, with sea-gulls circling overhead, and out on the broad green waters innumerable white-sailed yachts that dipped to the waves as they steered their various courses toward the mouths of the lochs. All around the base of these distant hills we could see the tiny villages—white and shining in the sun—which are beloved of the Glasgow folks: nestlings of little stone villas built among the rocks and the trees, and fronting such spacious views and such lovely scenery as belong to no other river in Europe. Should we dart up the Gare Lock and see the wonders of Glen Fruin? Or sail up the noble Loch Long to the rainy regions of Arrochar and the silent sides of Ben Ima? Or dive into Hell's Glen, and cross over to see the preparations being made for the Royal visit at Inverary Castle? Or linger about the Kyles of Bute, and forget the roar of the Metropolis and the strife of Parliament in the loneliness of the lovely Loch Striven? Amid the crowd of excited porters, and frantic mothers with wandering families, and irate fathers who had lost their fishing-rods, and amid all the hurry, and roar, and distraction of whistling pipes, and churning paddles, and clanging bells, it was impossible to arrive at a calm decision. And so we "took that which lay nearest us," and crossed the gangway, on chance, into a vessel bound for some unknown destination.

And, lo! as we stood out toward the open Frith, all the wild noise died down, and the prevailing sound was the monotonous throbbing of the paddles on the calm water. Greenock herself, probably the dirtiest town in this unhappy world, began to shimmer behind a gauzy veil of sunlight; while down by Gourock, toward the point at which the Cloch Lighthouse, white as a star, juts out into the blue sea, the low-lying line of hills grew faint and visionary. The other side of the estuary was gradually becoming more distinct; and along the western side of the promontory of Roseneath we came in sight of the imposing villas, and keeps, and castles, which the Glasgow merchants and shipbuilders have built over the sea there, perching them on plateaux of mica schist, and having them well surrounded by birch, and elm, and rowan. A village consisting of these cottages and castles, with plenty of wood around, and a picturesque shore in front, is a wondrous novelty to him who has derived his notions of the seaside from the monotonous sands and chalk-cliffs of the South of England. Mr. Brown can find no words—not even Parliamentary phrases—to express his profound surprise and delight with this sort of watering-place.

“Why,” he says, “they’d call those mountains in my part of the country; and there seems to be lakes by the dozen that could swallow Grasmere and Windermere, and never wink over it; and every man seems to have dotted down his house wherever he liked on the side of the hills. Then the rocky shore, with its shingle; and the clear sea-water; and the clumps of forest stretching down to the sea—why is this not known?”

Mr. Brown, M. P., is a good deal more familiar with the painted villas of Como, and the malodorous hotel at the foot of the Thuner See, and the gay boats on the Lake of Luzerne, than with the meres and lochs of his native land; and in that respect he represents a much larger constituency than Bourton-in-the-Marsh. However, we steam into Kilcreggan and touch at Cove, and then cross over to the Holy Loch, and to the small village of Strone. At this point, which juts out into the Frith, and commands a magnificent view southward, with the misty peaks of Arran forming the furthest sign of land, Brown puts down his foot.

“You shall whisk me no further,” he remarks. “I mean to study this section of Paradise before we continue our travels. For who knows but that we may suddenly find ourselves at the gates?”

Not only that, but the little inn at Strone, which we presently reached, instantly recommended itself to Mr. Brown as the very place where he could accomplish that great project which was constantly before his mind.

“This is the very place,” he remarked confidentially, “to spend a week in, and get up some subject. You know I have all those papers about the salaries of Custom Clerks in my bag. Would you believe it, a member of the Ministry spent the whole of his holidays, a year or two ago, in going into this very matter. And it only needs the mastery of certain details to prove the excessive hardship——”

Mr. Brown never finished the sentence. His eye somehow got lost in the far distance where ships were crossing the broad blue plain lying between the Cloch Lighthouse and Dunoon. He forgot all about Parliament. How could one remember the dusky chamber, and the rows of orange faces, in view of this great breadth of sea, where the specks of steamers were slowly moving, with a line of smoke in their wake, and in view of the pleasant stretch of beach, where the clear green water was plashing idly on the pebbles? Up the Holy Loch, at the mouth of which Strone stands, the water lay still and blue as a sapphire, but out toward the sea there was a windy grayness that lost itself in the haze about Cumbrae and Bute. For some considerable time the contemplative member stood on the steps of the inn, as dead as the Sphinx to all outward impressions; and then, slowly coming back to the world around him, he found himself scanning an announcement which was posted up on a board at the end of the pier. It informed us that Mr. M'Farlane was disposed to let out horses and carriages for hire. In a very few minutes thereafter we were seated in a wagonette, and on the way to Loch Eck and Ardentinnay.

Very pleasant indeed is the shady drive under the great hills that lie above the Holy Loch. But what seemed to impress my companion most—especially as we got up the valley of the Echaig, and found the fresh-water Loch Eck stretching out before us under its splendid panorama of mountains—was the exceeding solitariness of the place. Here were no fashionable hotels or parties of elderly ladies being driven about in close carriages, or villas built on the site of cottages once inhabited by poets. By the side of the lonely lake we came to a rude little inn where the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh and our Highland driver hob-and-nobbed over a trifle of honest Lagavulin whisky that had a look of peat-reek and moss-water about its soft yellow hue; and then, with freshened spirits and keener pace we dashed down the great and open glen that leads under the slopes of Cruachan back to Loch Long. How the long blue lake shone in the light as we came near it! and how green the trees were all about Ardentinnay, where Tannahill met the lass whose praises are now sung in every Scotch village! Here too Mr. Brown, M. P., lingered awhile, remarking that a cautious man never pronounced upon whisky until he had tasted it twice. I think he said something about Sir Wilfred Lawson—but that is not to the purpose. Suffice it to add that we drove back to Strone, along the level shores of Loch Long, in the calm of the evening; and there were plover whistling afar off in the twilight, and fish leaping up with a splash in the quiet bays.

Then having returned to the Holy Loch. Mr. Brown would have dinner postponed for yet another couple of hours; and we went to enjoy the humble sport of deep-sea fishing. No man ever died from excitement over this form of amusement; but still, in the gathering darkness, with the mountains around the head of the loch growing of a deep purple under the clear silver-gray of the twilight, it had its recompenses. And by the time we hauled up anchor to row home, the lights of Strone were burning like stars of gold: and in the east there were a faint star or two; and high over the Cloch Lighthouse—which was sending a calm yellow ray over the sea—there rose the faint sickle of the moon, to touch the wet blades of our oars as they rose and fell.

CHAPTER. II.

AN INVITATION.

WITH the morning breeze blowing coolly in from the sea, through an open window that showed us the blue waters of the Frith, with the whiting and codlings he had caught the night before now lying crisp and hot on the table before him, with his eye ranging over fresh cream, and excellent butter, and hot rolls, Mr. Brown, M.P., would have been happy enough; but you may guess his frame of mind when a letter brought us both an urgent invitation to join the party on board the schooner-yacht Kittiewake, then lying up in Loch Shira, at the head of Loch Fyne. Now the owner of the Kittiwake is also an M.P.; but he sits on the Opposition benches, and during the session just closing has done his best to vex the Government. I remind the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh of this fact, and hint that he may as well be cautious about joining the Kittiwake.

“Mr. Gladstone won’t see me,” he replies, with a solemn wink, and the half-whisper with which a boy talks of playing truant. “Besides, could you get any place more fitted than a yacht for beginning to study an off-subject seriously? 'Those Customs Clerk's salaries, you know——'

Some half-hour thereafter two contemplative travellers might have been seen on the small wooden pier of Blairmore, patiently waiting for the Carrick Castle. Blairmore is a place of excessive importance, for it has a telegraph office; and it is a pretty place withal, its straggling row of cottages lying at the foot of what we English folks would call a mountain, while the bold rocks that form its shore alternate with charming little bays, where the clear wavelets splash on white sand and beds of pebbles. Its inhabitants, at this moment, apparently consist of three men, who sit on the rocks and bask idly in the sun; but as the Carrick Castle comes churning her way over from Kilcreggan, other signs of life become visible. Some young ladies who have been transacting business in the grocery store come down to the quay in full holiday-costume; and Mr. Brown—but there is no saying who may read this veracious narrative. Suffice it to say that the Carrick Castle at last arrives, with a prodigious blowing of steam and noise of paddle; that we scramble on board by a gangway which is almost perpendicular; and that, as we leave the quay to steam up the calm and lovely waters of Loch Long, my companion expresses his profound disgust to find, by recognizing certain southern accents, that he has run against a batch of the inevitable tourists. Though why one tourist should hate all other tourists, and cherish wicked hopes that they may be drowned, or run over, or smashed up in a collision; and why any one traveller, abroad or at home, should think that all Europe was meant only for him, and draw a miraculous distinction between himself and the herd, is a problem which the British Association would fail to solve.

Once more we pass the half-dozen cottages that form the pretty village of Ardentinny, and then before us open out the northern stretches of Loch Long, with vast ranges of mountains rising beyond into the pale blue sky. Nowhere, perhaps, in all the West Highlands is there to be found so much variety of mountain outline as in this splendid group of hills—some of them low, and smooth, and undulating, with their patches of bracken and heather become as soft as velvet under the warm midday light—others more lofty, but still round and flowing in outline, with immense fir-forests stretching to their summit, and woolly fragments of cloud clinging here and there to the trees—and beyond these again serrated peaks, as blue and sharp as the outline of Arran when the island grows dark before a storm. To-day we have every variety of effect, as there are huge masses of white cloud slowly drifting over from the western sea; and now it is the knobbly heights of "Argyle's Bowling-green," and now it is the peaks of the Cobbler and Ben Ima, and again the far hills that stretch over to Loch Lomond that catch the dark blue shadows and brighten up again as the clouds pass.

That mountainous promontory which has been grimly called "Argyle's Bowling-green," cuts the upper portion of Loch Long into two branches, and the more picturesque of these two, Loch Goil, runs up between the hills for a matter of eight or ten miles. In summer-time nothing could be more still and beautiful than this little loch, when the woods, and crags, and mountains on both sides of it are reflected in its dark-blue mirror. On a rock that juts out into the loch stand the shattered ruins of Carrick Castle (after which our bright little steamer is named), a building which must have proved a powerful stronghold in the old days when rapine and slaughter devastated those silent glens at the bidding of rival chiefs. But these Highland solitudes are fast becoming peopled—in the summer-time, at least—by the pushing and industrious Saxon, who saves up his money in Glasgow, and then comes down here to build a cottage, or a villa, or a castle—as his means and tastes suggests—at the foot of the mountains. The Gaelic-speaking population have become shepherds, fishermen, boatmen, and so forth; while there are in every village a number of inhabitants who have no ostensible occupation, but eke out a living by doing odd jobs in gardening or game-keeping for the Lowland or English visitor. Yet these Highland folk retain many of the traditional characteristics of their race. They are hospitable, courteous, and quick in apprehension; while even the poorest of them have a certain self-respect and independence which is very different from certain peculiarities of our agricultural laborer. Ask a shepherd to show you the way if you happen to get lost among the hills, and he will walk a couple of miles to do so; he will accept a glass of whisky gravely, and sit down with you to converse about matters in general, and especially about a son of a Duke having married a daughter of the Queen; but in a few minutes he will have convinced the stranger that it would be impossible to offer him a shilling. But this independence and sense of equality—which is no assumption, but the natural habit of men who are unaccustomed to the social distinctions of cities—gets sadly impaired along the route that tourists, and, above all, English tourists, frequent. There the Highlander not unfrequently becomes a sort of Red Indian—greedy, cunning, obsequious, and given to copious drinking. Taking the bad with the good, however, the Highlanders are a fine race; and some—among them, I should think, Mr. Matthew Arnold—will regret that those Celtic tribes are being from day to day pushed further back into the mountains, instead of holding their own and tempering Saxon civilization with their non-commercial virtues and their poetic imaginative habit of mind.

When we landed at the little village of Lochgoilhead, and walked along the curve of the shore to the inn, Mr. Brown once more put down his foot. He would not budge—Kittiwake or no Kittiwake.

“Who knows when I may be here again?” he asked (for it is said he has some dark notion of being appointed the governor of an unpronounceable island in the Pacific), “and do you think I am going to leave a spot like this without seeing it, merely because a man offers me a berth in a yacht? Besides, I must put those papers in order before going on board, you know——”

Mr. Brown did not touch the papers. Some half-hour after luncheon, when he had sat and gazed down the loch, and admired the shadows of the mountain and clouds that mingled with the green rushes at the head of the lake, the spirit of the mountaineer arose within him, and nothing would do but an ascent of the highest hill in the neighborhood. Accordingly we set out for the summit of Ben Donich, following for a time the course of a small river that comes tumbling in white and brown masses down a rocky channel. It was a tedious and laborious ascent, but when, after two hours' constant climbing, we stood by the heap of stones on the bare and windy top, the view amply repaid us. All around lay a magnificent panorama of mountains—on the north especially, they seemed to be huddled against each other like mighty waves that had been suddenly petrified; while far away in the south lay the broad waters of the Frith and the open sea, with a network of lochs, and islands, and promontories between. We sat there so long and so silent that a mountain hare came out from its hiding, and then, catching sight of us, darted like lightning over the scant grass and the rocks. As we turned to descend, the hills west of Loch Fyne were growing purple under a pale yellow sunset; and Loch Goil, beneath our feet, lay still and gray under the dark shadows of Ben Bheulah and Ben-an-Lochan. Indeed, when we got down to the village, night had fallen; but it was the clear, pale-green night that in those high latitudes is only a twilight. We sat down to dinner when most of the inhabitants of Lochgoilhead had doubtless got to bed; and thereafter we discussed, over a small beaker of the wine of the country, our plans for the morrow.

“That coach that goes through Hell’s Glen to Loch Fyne does not start till one o’clock,” remarked the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh, “and before then I shall have time to take a look at those comparative scales of salaries.”

CHAPTER IV.

THROUGH HELL’S GLEN.

A WILD morning of rain, and wind, and driving mist had broken over Loch Goil and its amphitheatre of hills; and when Mr. Brown, M.P., looked out of his bedroom window he scarcely recognized the place. The loch was a plain of stormy gray, with white-tipped waves rushing up; Carrick Castle had disappeared as completely as if the Athol men had finished their work and swept it into the sea; while the great clouds of mist that came over from the west worked such wonders with the hills, that Ben Bheulah and Ben-an-Lochan seemed playing at hide and seek behind the vast white veil. But as the morning wore on a brief glimmer of sunshine broke out between the showers; and at length, while the clouds seemed to gather themselves up in black and thunderous masses over the entrance to Hell’s Glen, a great splash of blue appeared in the sky, and corresponding dashes of color began to show on the lake. And then, across the bars of sunshine, the steamer came slowly up the loch; and as the noise of the funnel broke on the silence of the place, we made our way down toward the pier to catch one of the two coaches.

Behold us now perched on the box-seat of a huge vehicle, that has a team of five horses to draw it up and over the mountain pass that lies between Lochgoilhead and Loch

Fyne. Whether this gorge was called Hell's Glen by reason of the wild and rugged nature of its scenery, or on account of the intense heat that the mountains reflect down into its depths, it is hard to say; but at all events the whole place is haunted with legends of Satan, and a surly old gentleman who used to live in a solitary farm here came to be known as the devil himself. Shortly after leaving Lochgoilhead the road through the pass begins to ascend, and leads by the side of a rocky ravine, down which a powerful stream thunders night and day. In front of us the mountains seem to form a gigantic barrier, but gradually we catch a glimpse of a white road far up the side of a distant hill; and as the horses seem to have plenty to do, the road being rather heavy, we all get out and set out to climb up a short cut—a wet and slippery footpath, which leads through tangled oak, and willow, and birch. Away on the right of us glimmers the road that leads to Glencroe and that “Rest-and-be-thankful,” on which Wordsworth wrote a sonnet (having a trick of writing a sonnet on most things he saw anywhere). Higher and still higher rises the road—while we occasionally overtake and occasionally lag behind, the painfully toiling coach; while the mountains in front are continually changing their aspect under the breezy sky. And at last, when we have nearly got to the end of the giant pass—the road on which we stand being itself 2400 feet above the level of the sea—lo! at our feet we suddenly find the whole length of Lock Fyne, with its wooded hills shimmering greenly in the sun, and the small steamer at St. Catherine's waiting to take us across. We are still a few miles from the loch; but up on this height the broad shoulders of wild moorland that slope down to the water are as nothing; and we feel ourselves already opposite Inverary, and the gray castle of the duke, that seems but a speck among the trees, and the bold front of Duniquoich, with its watch-tower perched high on the bare rock.

The descent from this pinnacle to St Catherine's will never be forgotten by any one who has sat on the box-seat of the coach. To drive a four-in-hand along Piccadilly and through the Park, and up again by Kensington Gore, seems to the uninitiated a comparatively safe and easy performance; but to take a team of five horses at full gallop down a steep mountain road, which has sharp turns in it, and an occasional narrow stone bridge that spans a chasm, is a very different matter. And as Mr. Brown felt himself getting through the air at an alarming rate of speed, he became silent. He had been talking Parliamentary rapture about the view; but now his face was fixed as that of Memnon, and he only turned his eyes from the necks of the five horses in front of him to the pile of trunks behind him, which threatened to come down and nip his head off as a girl might nip off a rosebud.

"Do you sometimes let a horse down?" he said at length, in a timid way, to the driver.

"Sometimes," was the grim reply.

"But, as a rule, they are sure-footed, eh?"

"Oo, aye, as a rule; but a horse is no infallible, ony mair than a man."

Mr. Brown said nothing, but held firmly on, as the coach, and luggage, and passengers swung round the corners of bridges, or dipped into the hollows of the road. But when we finally got down to the shore, and stopped at St. Catherine's, Mr. Brown descended, shook himself, and came forward with a very different look on his face. He was quite cheerful now. He spoke of the drive in a familiar and a dry way, and asked if we had not "come a cracker" down that hill.

"I should not like to have brought those horses down," he said, critically scanning the team. "With a pair, you know, it would have been different."

Right opposite us now lay the straggling white houses of Inverary, and the handsome clumps of trees around the Duke of Argyle's castle, and the mouth of the little armlet of Loch Fyne that is known as Loch Shirra.

"And there, as I live, is the Kittiwake coming over for us," remarked Mr. Brown, pointing to a handsome little cutter of about 30 tons that was running across the loch before a westerly breeze. I ventured to suggest to Mr. Brown who is much more familiar with the forms of the House than with nautical matters that schooner-yachts have, as a rule, two masts, and that this little cutter cannot fairly be suspected of measuring 60 tons.

"Ah, to be sure," said Mr. Brown carelessly. "I was thinking of something else—of those Custom clerks' papers, you know. I really forgot all about them this morning. But there will be plenty of time on board the yacht."

We crossed over Loch Fyne to Inverary in the little steamer that was waiting at the pier; and, as luck would have it, discovered the owner of the Kittiwake in the inn at which we begged for some lunch. The member for the ancient and historical borough of Slow, in Somersetshire, is a tall, bluff, rosy-cheeked gentleman, with a tremendous laugh, a fine belief in Conservative principles, and a knowledge of shooting and yachting which the editor of a sporting paper might envy. His name is Weyland, and he is the colonel of a volunteer regiment. He is great in the House between half-past four and five; for he has the art of asking the Government the most vexatious conundrums, which no Minister can answer. We receive a boisterous and hearty welcome; and then says Mr. Brown—

“Wasn't it here that Dr. Johnson asked for a gill of whisky, to find out what made a Scotchman happy?”

The hint was enough; and the steward of the Kittiwake, who was in attendance, was ordered to bring in, for testing purposes, a jar of whisky that had just been purchased in the inn. Warmed with a moderate quantity of that fiery fluid, Mr. Brown's reminiscences came thickly on him.

“Didn't Captain Dalgetty visit this place? And there are herrings here, I know. And didn't Burns come to this very inn, or some other inn, and write something on the window? But what will the people say when the Queen comes? And—and—Weyland, old fellow, you're looking first-rate.”

Mr. Brown, indeed, was in excellent spirits as we started for a walk up to the castle that was then expected to receive a Royal visit. The building itself is not an architectural marvel—being a plain, square mass of gray chlorite-slate, with a tower at each corner, and a tall winged pavilion rising over the centre. But the position and surroundings of Inverary Castle are singularly beautiful. The rivers Aray and Shira brawl down from the mountains along rocky channels that come through dense woods, and are hanging with masses of ferns and wild flowers; the grounds around the castle are intersected by magnificent avenues of elms and limes, that have made many a fine perspective for the camera; and the building itself, from the summit of a smooth plateau, faces the blue waters and steep hills of Loch Shira and Loch Fyne, and on the left, the bold peak of Duniquoich, that seems to keep guard over the far and unseen deer-haunts of Ardkinglas.

Thereafter we walked leisurely up and along the margin of Loch Shira, to the little bay in which the Kittiwake lay at anchor, her sails furled, and her graceful spars mirrored accurately on the still surface beneath. Mr. Brown was in such a gay humor, that he volunteered to steer the gig which was sent ashore for us; and the post of honor was willingly accorded him. It seemed to one, at least, of the party whom he thus conducted, that he made one or two preliminary pulls with the ropes, to see which way the boat's head would turn; but all the same we got safely toward the neighborhood of the yacht, and then our coxswain wisely allowed the men to get up to the gangway by the manipulation of the oars. A proud man he was as he stepped on the white deck and looked round him on the trim and bright vessel, on the calm bosom of the lake, and the fair scenery around. His arms were crossed as are those of Dan O'Connell in the portrait in the Reform Club; and he appeared ready to burst out with a noble quotation from Sir Walter Scott. It would have been the deepest cruelty to hint that the Customs clerks were wearying for that reform in their salaries which he had privately undertaken to secure.

CHAPTER IV.

SETTING FORTH.

WHEN on the following morning Mr. Pisistratus Brown, M.P., came up on deck, no words could convey his delight with the comforts and luxuries of the Kittiwake. The ingenious manner in which use had been made of every corner; the pretty decorations in the saloon; the excellence of the meats and drinks that Weyland's steward had placed before us for supper—all were matter of enthusiastic encomium; but the climax of his praise was reached in describing how he found an elegant little washhand-basin and a veritable fresh-water pipe in his bedroom. Here a shout of laughter was heard, and the Member for Slow put his head above the companion-ladder.

"Well, whatever you may call it," said Mr. Brown, with some natural irritation, "it is a bedroom. I don't care whether it's a hatchway, or a tarpaulin, or a jib-boom, so long as I get a comfortable night's rest in it."

However, Mr. Brown soon began to pick up nautical phrases, and he could scarcely be persuaded to go below for breakfast, so interested was he in seeing the men get the Kittiwake under weigh. Indeed, no one spent much time over that meal, for we were all anxious to have a final look at Inverary. And so, when we again went on deck, we found the large white sails of the Kittiwake bending over before a gentle breeze, and as we bore down the blue waters of Loch Fyne, Inverary, and the gray castle, and the noble avenues of trees went slowly past us in a moving panorama. The mountains up by the head of the lock were still dim and misty, and away toward the deer-forests of Ardkinglas gray swathes of cloud still hung about the hills; but round about us the sunlight was clear and warm, striking on the breezy blue of the lake, on the white stretch of shore, and on the woods that were still green and moist with the dews of the night.

“If I were the Duke of Argyle,” said the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh, as he pensively regarded the beautiful picture formed by the semicircular head of the loch, with Inverary Castle nestling under the woods and hills, “do you think I’d spend night after night in that melancholy hall listening to toothless old gentlemen mumbling incoherent speeches that the country doesn’t care twopence about——”

“I wish you’d speak with more respect of the House of Lords,” said the Member for Slow warmly. “Whatever the country may think, mind you, these men are doing their best for it, when they might, if they chose, be fishing in Norway, or enjoying themselves on the Mediterranean, or skylarking among these lochs, just like you and me, who have no business here whatever.”

“I have only to say,” remarked Mr. Brown, with some suspicion of reserve and coldness in his manner, “that I am not neglecting my duties voluntarily. When I think of the Ministry and my fellow-members continually sitting up till three or four o’clock in the morning in this weather, I should be ashamed to find myself here if I had not definite instructions from my doctor.”

Here the Conservative Member was rude enough to wink; and one of our party, a large and good-natured Glasgow bailie, broke into a horse laugh.

“Besides,” continued Mr. Brown, taking no heed of the interruption, “a private member may do more good to his country by taking a brief holiday in order to study a certain subject, than by merely remaining to form a unit in a ‘mechanical’ majority that is already big enough. I have at this moment downstairs—well, I suppose I must say ‘below’

—papers on a financial topic which deserves, and even demands, serious consideration. The salaries of Government officials form a subject which requires careful scrutiny; and how can you give it more time and attention than by taking a short holiday?"

"I suppose you've found out that some police-clerk has 12*s.* 6*d.* a year more than he should have," said the Member for Slow, with a prodigious grin; and then, putting aside the quarrel, he asked Mr. Brown whether he preferred the Campbeltown or the Islay distilleries. Mr. Brown replied in favor of Lagavulin; and the political discussion was adjourned "sine die until the afternoon."

As we opened out the successive bays and headlands formed by the undulating shores of Cowal, the full stretch of Loch Fyne came broadly into view, until far in the south we could see the bold line of rocky cliff that runs down from Tarbert to Skipness, and beyond that again the pale blue mountains of Arran, showing a jagged and faint outline against the sky. No plan of our cruise had been as yet accurately decided upon; and it was left for Mr. Brown to say whether we should go through the Crinan Canal and take a trip to Oban, or go for a preliminary run through the Kyles of Bute and thereafter round by Arran, Cantire, and Islay. He decided on the former, but insisted in the first place that we should have an opportunity of seeing one of the fleets of Loch Fyne fishing-boats setting out, which he had heard was a most picturesque sight. It was accordingly arranged that we should anchor in Loch Gilp for that day, and not attempt to go through the Crinan until the following morning. So it happened that we got down to Ardrishaig, at the end of the Crinan Canal, about midday; and when the yacht had been safely anchored we went ashore to see the Iona come in with her cargo of tourists bound for the North.

When the stately steamer at length showed her two red funnels coming round the point, Mr. Brown hastened down to the pier, apparently with the notion that he might meet some friend from the South. But when the small and hurrying crowd bustled out of the boat, and struggled through the swarm of barefooted boys anxious to carry their luggage for them, they were found to be all strangers, and Mr. Brown regarded them as they walked up to the small steamer on the canal, with a look of profound compassion. Yet why should tourists be regarded as strange and unhappy beings, whom one should regard with sympathy? There was nothing mournful in the procession of people who carried their hand bags, and top-coats, and umbrellas, and what not, and who seemed to regard the little steamer on the canal as a mere toy after their acquaintance with the spacious and handsome Iona. We saw the poor creatures off. Somehow they seemed to be away from home. They were going out into that wild western region where the Atlantic waves roll in among lonely islands ; and we half feared they might never return to the South, or that they might experience rain or some other dire evil. As for ourselves, we were going through the Crinan, too ; but we should be quite at home, and were certain to enjoy it.

A fine sight it was, that setting out of the herring fleet in the yellow afternoon, with the bronzed and varnished hulls of the boats shining like so many spots of brownish red on the calm blue of the lake. Here, too, were none of the tattered and pot-bellied fishermen of Brighton, living on occasional hauls of mackerel and occasional shillings got from visitors—but crews of lithe and stalwart men, big-boned and spare-fleshed, who plied the enormous oars with a swing and ease that told of splendid physiques, hard exercise, and tolerably good living. The wind had entirely gone down, and the various boats that left the harbor in straggling groups formed a strange sort of picturesque regatta, their oars scarcely troubling that still plain of blue. Here and there a brown sail hung half-mast high, just in case a slight breeze might be got at the mouth of the bay ; but each boat had its four enormous oars regularly rising and falling as they all drew away from us. And we could hear the laugh and jest come across the still water, as two of the boats would get within speaking distance ; and now and again a verse of some shrill Gaelic song would float towards us, the notes of it keeping time to the oars. The further the boats drew out toward the broad bosom of the loch, the deeper grew their color under the warm and level light of the sun, until many of them seemed like rose-colored buoys placed far out on that smooth plain. And then, as they reached a line of darker water on the loch, we could see them one by one run up the broad brown sail to catch the light breeze. And while we still sat and wondered how they would spend the long and dark night, and what songs would be sung by the side of the stove, and whether rain would compel them to make the sail into a tent, and what sort of take they would bring home with them in the cold gray hours of the dawn, lo ! the boats had disappeared as if by magic, and there was nothing before us but the far and desolate shores of Cowal.

We had a pleasant evening in the snug little saloon of the Kittiwake ; and Mr. Brown for once postponed the consideration of the Customs clerks' grievance in order to stake sixpence at loo (limited). And then, as he departed to his state-room (having won the price of a box of cigars, or thereabouts), he informed us that on the next day he would show us all how to detect the presence of water-hens.

"Cras to-morrow, iterabimus, we sail, ingens æquor through the Crinan Canal."

These were his parting words ; and they were very fairly pronounced.

CHAPTER V.

THROUGH THE CRINAN.

WHAT is a canal? The ordinary answer would be, a narrow and monotonous channel filled with a yellow fluid, that connects disagreeable places, and is the medium of a cheap and unpicturesque traffic. The dull-hued snake that winds about our manufacturing towns, that lies amid coal-dust and the refuse of factories, is, if possible, a more hideous thing than the melancholy suburbs around it. But there are canals and canals ; and up here in Argyleshire a canal becomes a succession of clear little lochs, connected by a line of artificial channel that runs through the most charming scenery, and has its banks laden with trees, and bushes, and tangled masses of wild flowers. Here the small Highlander angles with a bent pin for fish that he can see down in the cool, clear depths ; here the water-hen hides in the sedges, or sails out on the calm surface to call her young together. As you walk along the grassy banks every hundred yards produces a new picture—from the moment you leave the blue sweep of Loch Gilp behind until you come in sight of Loch Crinan and the wild rocks that guard the harbor from the force of the western sea. On your right hand stretches a far plain, that is varied with stream, and wood, and rock ; on your left peaks of the Knardale mountains are shut off by a range of hills that almost overshadow the canal, and are clad in all the verdure of bracken, and moss, and young oak and birch. You can hear the murmuring of streams in the deep little glens that are cloven in their sides ; and you can hear the call of the black-cock far up on the heathery knolls that shine in rosy purple under the fierce light of the midday sun. The small lakes that are strung like pearls on the lithe bank of the canal are wonders of loveliness ; and if you can only manage to escape the passage of the steamer you may forget that this is a canal, and find yourself lost in the utter loneliness of Highland scenery.

There is every facility, too, for the stranger to enjoy the walk from Loch Gilp to Loch Crinan ; for toward the western side of the canal there are fifteen locks, and as the whole distance is only nine miles, one has ample time to get to Crinan on foot. Indeed, when we had seen the Kittiwake started on her voyage, we took no more thought of her, and speedily lost sight of her. Mr. Brown's parting with her was almost pathetic ; he had acquired such a tenderness for the yacht as men get for favorite horses that have served them well.

"She looks like a queen taken captive," he said, as they began to drag her ignominiously along. "I suppose when we see her in Loch Crinan, she will have her sails up again and be something like herself—freshening herself up, as it were, for her northward flight. And we shall see Jura, shall we not?—and Scarba, and Corryvreckan, and Colonsay? I declare to you, all last night, as the yacht lay and rolled in the ripple of the bay, it seemed to keep time to that old ballad about the Chief of Colonsay. You know how it goes—

As you pass through Jura's Sound,
Bend your course by Scarba's shore,
Shun, oh ! shun the gulf profound,
Where Corryvreckan's surges roar.

Wouldn't the house rise to a quotation like that—say that you were warning the Government against courting Opposition cheers"—and here the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh unconsciously paused ; but his arm was still uplifted, and he gazed into blank space, as if his glittering eye had in reality seized the Treasury Bench and pinned Mr. Gladstone there.

We were fortunate enough to miss the swarm of barefooted young Celts who haunt the passengers by the steamer, and offer to transact business in milk and hazel-nuts. We only met one of them—a small maiden of six or seven, with sun-tanned arms and feet, and hair so prodigiously fair as to be almost white. It was at the Carnbaan Inn—a convenient resting-place at the beginning of the series of locks. Mr. Brown, obeying a maxim of his medical adviser—“Wherever you travel, the best drink is the vin du pays”—had refreshed himself with a modest quantity of the Lagavulin he had grown to love, and was just coming out of the inn when that “kleine M. Stenderin” came forward with a little tin jug in her hand, and said with the peculiar Highland inflection that distinguishes North from South Scotland, “Are ye for any nits, sir?” Mr. Brown looked at the small and timid merchant, and said, “My little girl, I don’t know what you say; but you are too pretty a little girl to have no shoes and stockings, and so you will take this half-sovereign to your mother and tell her to buy you some.”

Remonstrance with Mr. Brown, M. P., about this preposterous action was of no avail. It was useless to point out to him that he was corrupting a hardy independent population; that all over the Highlands the children enjoyed the freedom and health of running about with bare feet and legs; and that this small girl was being transformed from a merchant into a pauper. He folded up the coin in a piece of paper, and bade her put it in her pocket. Then in the most natural way in the world, she held out the jugful of hazel-nuts in return. The Member of Bourton-in-the-Marsh looked puzzled. He might have answered off-hand a conundrum about the Babs of Persia, or even accepted at a moment’s notice the command of an iron-clad, but he could not for the life of him tell what to do with two handfuls of green nuts. Yet there was a principle at stake: he was forced to take them. Finally he bethought himself of his hat: and so it befell that, until we were well out of sight of that little Highland woman, a member of the Imperial Legislature of this country walked with a hatful of nuts in his hand, while an almost vertical sun was pouring down its firecest rays on his bald head.

Weyland, M.P. for Slow, and two other members of our party, had gone on during this exciting adventure; and we eventually found them sitting in dead silence behind a group of tall bushes, opposite a part of the canal where there were abundant rushes on the other side. Weyland had in his hand a large black air-cane ; the Glasgow bailie was regarding rather timorously a saloon pistol. Mr. Brown became quite excited.

“ You just watch me bring a moor-hen out. I will undertake to bring a moor-hen out in ten minutes from these rushes, and as many water-rats as you like from the bank there—for half-a-sovereign I will.”

“ It is rather a mean way of making up your losses by generosity,” I remark ; and then Mr. Brown creeps up on tiptoe to the bushes. His finger is on his lips. He sits down with an awful air of compressed energy on his face ; and then, in the stillness, he begins his performance. Since the days of Herr Von Joel—those happy days when songs, and glees, and choruses had not been supplanted by acrobats and ventriloquists—no man has imitated the call of a bird as Mr. Brown now succeeds in doing. It is marvellous. We almost feel ourselves becoming moor-hens under the process. Only the real moor-hens do not seem to appear. Through chinks in the leaves we scan the dense rushes ; but there is no sign of that half-domestic wild fowl, whose yellow bill and bobbing head and white cleft tail are alike familiar to English rivers and to Scotch moorlands. But lo ! as if by magic another bird bobs up in the middle of the water, some distance further down. “ A dabchick ! ” is the mental exclamation of every one, and stealthily the smooth black tube that Weyland holds is pointed through the leaves. There is a sharp click, a splash in the water, and the next moment the dabchick is lying on the surface of the canal, its legs uppermost.

“ You’ve spoilt your chance of getting a water-hen all for that miserable dabchick,” said Mr. Brown, with some irritation.

“ That miserable dabchick ! ” cried Weyland. “ You can take the breast of this dabchick, and give it to your lady-love to wear for your sake ; but what could you do with a water-hen ? Four-and-twenty of them could hardly flavor a steak-pie ; and then ketchup would do it as well.”

“ I should have had a moor-hen out in another minute,” said Mr. Brown.

“ Never mind,” said the Opposition Member ; “ you can work the charm another time.”

Mr. Brown soon recovered from his disappointment, and began to talk enthusiastically of all that we were to see and do when we had got out to the wilder islands in the west. He had vague plans for testing the flesh of various sea-fowl to judge whether the home-produce of this country might not extend its area, and an addition be made to the food of the poor. Then he bethought him of making a collection of stuffed birds, all of his own killing, ranging from the lordly osprey down to the sea-lark.

“We shall have abundance of them,” he remarked confidentially, “once we have got rid of these obstructions; and you will see how I shall knock off that business connected with the grievances of the Customs clerks. I should be ashamed of having postponed the matter so long, but that the delay was unavoidable. How could one get up statistics, and make comparisons of tables, when we had all the bother of getting through the canal before us? Nobody could expect one to carry a bundle of papers nine miles, and sit down to work by the side of the road, could they? I don’t think I neglect my duty any more than anybody else. I am sure I don’t—I am the last man in the world to do so. But you’ve got to draw the line somewhere, and humor Nature, and temper mental work by physical exercise, or where would you be?”

Mr. Brown spoke in quite an appealing and almost injured tone, which was quite unnecessary. Anybody who knows the inhabitants of Bourton-in-the-Marsh is aware that not for worlds would they change their representative; and as for Customs clerks, they are so accustomed to waiting that they won’t mind.

Towards the afternoon we were overtaken by the gayly-painted little screw steamer that transfers travellers going North from the Iona to the kindred vessel lying at Crinan. As we reached that small port, which nestles in a corner of a rocky bay, the great steamer had sailed away toward Oban, and the Kittiwake was lying out at anchor. When we had got on board, Mr. Brown went to the bow and surveyed the prospect. There was rather a lowering sky in the West; but the gloom only heightened the wild and vague look of the rocks and islands lying out in the western sea, with the dusky peaks of Jura rising far in the South. All manner of sea-birds were visible; from the familiar gull that circled overhead, to the lonely heron that stood out at some distant promontory, a gray shadow against the dark rock. Mr. Brown went below to rummage among Weyland’s guns, and was disappointed to find that there were not over thirty or forty cartridges ready made. However, he came on deck again; and, in the fast-falling darkness, his talk was all of shooting-adventures, and storms, and rocks, and legends, and the delight of being separated from mankind. He was as anxious for the morrow as "the brave Macphail" who fell in with a mermaid as he was returning to his love of Colonsay; and Weyland, who had discovered his friend's copy of Leyden's poems, read out in noble accents these appropriate lines:

The lonely deck he paces o'er,
 Impatient for the rising day;
 And still from Crinan's moonlight shore,
 He turns his eyes to Colonsay.

CHAPTER VI.

FROM CRINAN TO OBAN.

As the tall Kittiwake stood out from Crinan Bay, with her white sails filled with a light breeze, her smooth decks shining in the sun, and her bows dipping gracefully to the long and even swell coming in from the Atlantic, Mr. Brown, M. P., clinging stoutly to the steel shrouds, became quite enthusiastic over the loveliness of the scene before him. He descanted to us on the wild and desolate look of Jura, with her gloomy mountains rising up in the southern sky; he turned to the smaller islands near him, and pointed out their rich colors that were soft and smooth in the haze of the heat; his eagle eye detected all manner of strange sea birds poised over or floating on the blue waters; and he declared that the motion of the yacht was delightful.

"Interfusa nitentes vites æquora Cycladas," he exclaimed, in quite a solemn and parliamentary tone,—“avoid the turbulent sea amid the shining Cyclades, as one might say; but did the Cyclades ever shine in bluer waters than these, and did Horace ever see islands more fair in his dreams of the Mediterranean? And I would dare to add that there is more imaginative power in the wild legends that hallow those lonely rocks and seas than in a cartload of the stories connected with the puddles and sandhills of Greece. Homer! I maintain that there is more depth of passion, of emotion, and of strong human interest in such a ballad as ‘Helen of Kirkconnel’ than in twenty Iliads all boiled up together in a tin-pot; and as for the blatant history of that nincompoop Æneas, it is tas atrocious a piece of commonplace manufacture as was ever committed in this miserable world; and if you want true imaginative and lyrical power, which is the sum and substance of poetry——”

Mr. Weyland, from the companion-ladder, handed up a breech-loader. The Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh regarded it for a moment with contempt; but he took it, nevertheless, and began to place a couple of cartridges in the barrels. We heard no more of Mr. Brown's theories of poetry, for he carefully made his way up to the bow, and placed himself there so that he might have a shot at any of those wild creatures which he had ventured to name for us. It is remarkable, however, that with two members of Parliament on board no one could find out in what month the statutory prohibition of shooting sea-fowl ends; but then, as Mr. Weyland remarked, it would be a hard thing if people who made the laws were not allowed to break them.

And so the Kittiwake sped on, opening out the Dorus Mor, or Great Gate, and gradually getting into those long swirls of sea that sweep round from Scarba, and produce strange bubblings and lines of foam on the calmest day. Away over on our left lay the channel between Jura and Scarba, where the whirlpool of Corryvreckan raves. We listened intently to catch the strange noise of its waters which had been described by many a poet as forever haunting “the distant isles that hear the loud Corbrechtan roar.” Campbell, who lived some miles to the south of Loch Crinan, says that even there he could hear the sound of the Corryvreckan straits. “When the weather is calm, and the adjacent sea scarcely heard on these picturesque shores, its sound, which is like the sound of innumerable chariots, creates a magnificent and fine effect.” No echo reached us of the turmoil which generally does prevail in that narrow channel. But all around us were evidences of those powerful currents that have gained for Corryvreckan its legendary fame. The sea around us seemed to boil up from mighty springs; and here and there, between those spacious circles of foam, we could see the thin hard line of a current. As the Kittiwake slowly made headway through the calm-looking whirlpools, her bow was caught every few minutes by some powerful stream, and twisted round with a sudden jerk. At other times she would come to a dead stop, as if she had run against a wall of iron. But so far from there being anything in the shape of a picturesque whirlpool, with a hollow centre, and a circumference of tossing waves, even the low ground swell of the Atlantic had disappeared. It is easy to understand, however, that these treacherous currents may, at certain seasons of the year, be greatly intensified in the rocky channel between Scarba and Jura; and, although the whirlpool of Corryvreckan, and its figures in books illustrative of natural wonders, is a myth, the swirls of the sea in the narrow straits have destroyed many a boat and drowned many a man, while in the calmest season the passage is never without a certain danger. Mr. Weyland, who is somewhat anxiously looking after the conduct of the Kittiwake, tells us that one evening last summer a profound excitement was caused in Oban by the report that the large steamer from Crinan, with all its valuable cargo of Southern tourists, had been drawn into the whirlpool of Corryvreckan, and wrecked on the rocks of Scarba. How such a wild story became current in a town which must be familiar with the channel, it is difficult to understand; but, as a matter of fact, hour after hour passed, and the steamer did not come in. Next morning, when everyone hurried down to the Quay to learn the news, the safety of the steamer was secured, but various forms of wild stories were being told of perilous escapes and dangers by sea. It eventually turned out that the mate of the steamer had sighted some smack or similiar sailing vessel drifting toward Corryvreckan; that he, with a couple of men, put off in a boat and overtook her, found her a derelict and towed, or endeavored to tow, her back to the steamer, while the passengers were probably repaid by the excitement of the chase for their being kept two or three hours late in getting to Oban. So that Corryvreckan is still believed in among its nearest neighbors.

Mr. Brown came aft abruptly.

“Take this gun,” he said.

The Member for Slow, who was contemplatively smoking a very large meerschaum, while his right hand rested on the tiller, and his eyes were leisurely scanning the long sweep of blue water before us, looked up with amazement. Mr. Brown gave the breech-loader to the Glasgow bailie—who handled it nervously, as a bachelor handles a baby—and said, with decision:

“This is a good opportunity, I think, for my entering into that question of the salaries now given to our clerks in the Customs. In such a matter delay only breeds discontent.”

and the Government, I am sure, will not be sorry to have the subject calmly, fully, and accurately placed before them by a private member."

Mr. Brown went down into his state-room, with quite a look of earnestness on his face. Presently he reappeared with a bundle of papers in his hand; and then, going toward the taffrail, he proceeded to open the parcel and place on the deck a series of documents, partly written, partly printed, and apparently largely consisting of figures. As they lay there, he gazed at them for a moment, but it was clear that his position was not a pleasant one. He changed from the taffrail to a camp stool; and again from the camp stool to a seat on the deck; but it was obvious that he could not quite suit himself as to a proper position. At last he said he would go below, so as to have his papers properly spread out before him.

"And yet," he said, pensively, "isn't it a shame to go below in this weather? You know we shall have plenty of wet days in which we shall be unable to do anything but work indoors, eh, Weyland?"

"Of course," said the Conservative member, "when you are on a cruise in Scotland, you are always safe in laying up something for a rainy day."

Mr. Brown packed up his papers, and took them below. When he came on deck again, he was quite cheerful, and even humorous, and proposed that he should take the helm, to which Mr. Weyland consented, on condition that his friend should give the necessary directions in case the wind should come round on the starboard quarter.

"I know what to do in a cutter," said Mr. Brown, timidly.

"Oh," said Weyland, "you know how to slack off the boom guy, haul in the mainsheet till you get the boom amidship, port the helm, jibe the mainsail; then slack off the mainsheet again, you know, hook the guy on the port side, haul taut the starboard runner and tackle, and overhaul the port one; same with the topping lift, hoist the head sails, and shift the sheets over."

"After that," said Brown, "I suppose I'd better throw myself over, too, and complete the thing. If you were to treat a yacht like that, there would not be a tooth left in its head. However, you may keep the tiller, Weyland. It is the only work I ever see you at, and when the rainy weather comes, goodness only knows how you will pass the time. I know I shall never come away again without having something to do during those odd moments of leisure that you meet in travelling. It's a sort of mainstay, you know—gives you a sense that you are not altogether idling when you have this work to fall back on. And especially when the work is of a character to remedy a great injustice, and give pleasure to a considerable number of your fellow beings—then, I say, you feel proud that you cannot be taunted with the mere self-seeking indolence of the holiday-maker."

By this time we had run northward by Luing, and Easdale, and Loch Feochan, and were standing in toward the Sound of Kerrara. Twilight was now falling over the islands and the sea, and only a faint show of red in the west showed where the sunset had been. When at last we cast anchor in Oban Bay, pale points of stars were beginning to glimmer on the water, and over there at Kerrara the white ridge of the moon was rising behind the black outline of the island, promising us a lovely night.

CHAPTER VII.

THE OPPORTUNITY AT LAST.

OBAN, as you see it in the dawn of a summer's morning, is fair and beautiful to look upon. In the daytime, you find that the capital of the western Highlands, which enthusiastic Scotchmen prefer to Biarritz, or Nice, or Naples, or any other place they do not happen to have seen, consists mainly of a row of dirty-white houses, stretching round a semicircular bay, the waters of which have, at certain states of the tide, an ancient and fish-like smell. There are no promenades, avenues, or pleasure-grounds; the chief thoroughfare being the street along the quay, which fronts the shops. Toward the west, however, there are a few villas picturesquely perched up on the side of the hills that lie behind the town, and down near the shore there are one or two big hotels. All these things, including the squalor about the quay, are transfigured by the early sunlight; and more especially if you are well out in the bay, and looking shoreward, Oban, when seen through the golden mist that floods down upon it from over the eastern hills, has something fine and picturesque about its position and almost rises to its reputation. For there are green hills and gray crags around it which cannot be made commonplace, and you have only to turn from the plain houses and the shops to find yourself looking out on the perpetual wonder and loveliness of the blue sea, with the rounded mountains of Mull showing a hundred tints of purple and rose-color, and the gloomy hills of Morven waking up from the mists of the night to catch the first yellow glimmering of the sun.

We found the Member for Bourton-in-the Marsh pensively kicking his heels over the gunwale of the Kittiwake. He had been awakened by the throbbing of the paddles of some great steamer, and had gone on deck to have a look at the new district into which he had ventured. He had been up for nearly two hours, had done nothing, and was a little peevish. He said some disrespectful things about Oban, which need not be repeated.

After breakfast, however, the amiable nature of his disposition asserted itself : and as he leaned his back against the ratlines, and calmly smoked a cigar, he began to approve of Oban, of the Highlands, of yachting. He even hinted to the Member for Slow that Conservatism had its good points. He told the Glasgow bailie that the Scotch should be proud of their mountains and lochs. He hoped the Queen would soon get better. Then he proposed we should all go ashore, have a look at Oban, and walk across to Dunstaffnage Castle.

Mr. Brown himself steered the gig into the quay, and managed it so cleverly as to receive a compliment, which he accepted gravely. Indeed, when he had got on shore to inspect Oban, the practiced eye might have detected the least thing of a lurch in Mr. Brown's walk, as of a man who had been accustomed to pace the quarter-deck. His dress, too, was rather nautical in appearance, so that at this moment he might have had his portrait taken as Admiral Brown, M. P. But he never ventured to say anything about shivering his timbers ; and as for a hornpipe, Mr. Brown's waist had disappeared about the time that the great Reform Bill was passed.

The few miles of road from Oban to Dunstaffnage led us through the most charming variety of scenery, beginning with a stretch of deep umbrageous wood, and thereafter taking us out into the daylight, and skirting the base of a series of wild and heathery hills. Something less than half way we reached a small freshwater lake, girt round about by sedges in which Mr. Brown declared there must be moorhens. Occasionally we met a group of the small and picturesque Highland cattle which are a godsend to the landscape painter; and so thoroughly had those small-headed, rough-coated, and sharp-horned brutes acquired the independent notions of their native land, that our companion the Glasgow bailie regarded with some trepidation their attitude, as they stood in the middle of the road and firmly looked at the strangers. Mr. Brown, however, was brave with the courage of ignorance. He had never been chased down a hillside by a "stot," or landed in a burn by the horns of a wicked little bull; and so, with the utmost confidence he charged and routed the various phalanxes that opposed our progress and scarcely walked any more proudly because of his victory.

In due time we came once more in sight of the sea, lying dark and blue along the lonely shores of Ossian's Morven. Nearer at hand lay the green island of Lismore, with here and there a nameless lump of dark rock jutting out of the rippling water, around it. But when we got further toward the west, so that we saw the magnificent line of jagged mountains stretching all along the northern horizon, the enthusiasm of Mr. Brown could not be expressed in words. There were great white clouds floating rapidly over so that every moment the colors of the mountains were changing, and while the sunlight fell here and there among the peaks that rise in Morven and Appin, far beyond Lock Etive and up by Glencoe, some mighty mass of rock would grow dark, and near, as if cowering under a thunder-cloud. Here and there, too, we could see some of those black clouds break into a gray fleece of rain and quietly erase a mountain from the picture; and then, again, its green sides would come glimmering through the wet, and a faint rainbow would appear to touch the thin line of lake at the mountain's foot.

At length we got down to the sea, and to the rocky headland on which stand the massive ruins of Dunstaffnage.

"To tell you the truth," said Mr. Brown, "I do not care for ruins—I do not care for anything—when I can turn to this wonderful picture of the sea and mountains and lochs. The more I look at it, the more I am inclined to register an awful vow never to return to a town again. Why should a man devote himself to the public good until he is just ready to drop into his coffin? I have done my share. I have a great mind never to return to London, but to have a small house built on this very promontory, and live here within the sound of the sea—until—until the time comes when I shall hear no more sounds. Besides what use am I—except to make one of a majority that is already so big as to make the Ministry a deal too cheeky? If we had a struggling Government, do you think we should have had all that hocus pocus about Epping Forest? Well, after all, you want independent members to look after those things. Perhaps I should better fulfil my duty by going back into the old track. I venture to hope that some of my countrymen owe something to my efforts in Parliament; and I know that in this matter of the Customs Clerks' grievances, I am working toward a most praiseworthy end. Forgive my talking about myself, Weyland, but I have often remarked that the sight of mountains and the sea—of the great powers of nature—forces on a man questions about his own position, and causes him to review his relations with the world. Thank you; the last was as good a cigar as a man ever smoked."

My friend was rather reserved and thoughtful during the walk to Oban, but he brightened up after dinner, and proposed we should go on shore to play a game of billiards at the hotel. As the gig slowly cleft its way through the dark water, the blades of the oar shedding gleams of phosphoric fire on each side, Mr. Brown remarked that both moon and stars were invisible. Indeed, before we reached the shore, a few drops of rain were falling.

"Is not that most fortunate?" said he. "Just as I was beginning to accuse myself of idleness, there comes the wet day which will enable me to get some work done. To-morrow—yes, to-morrow—I will redeem the promises I have made to myself—and so, Weyland, let us have a merry evening; and you will give me 30 in 100, and I will play you for a sovereign."

CHAPTER VIII.

FROM OBAN TO JURA.

WHERE was the rain? Were we really in the Highlands? When breakfast called us into the saloon the sun was shining down through the painted colors of the skylight, and throwing streaks of crimson and blue on the decorated sides of the cabin. Mr. Brown, M. P., professed himself profoundly disgusted. He regarded the sunlight as if it were his mortal enemy.

“Another day handed over to idleness,” he remarked, with a beautiful affectation of anger; “for you know, Weyland, a man cannot be expected to stop downstairs in this hot weather, and study a batch of figures. You can’t do it. I say you can’t do it. I am sure that matter of the salaries of those unfortunate Customs Clerks wants serious inquiry; but how can you go into it on a broiling day, and in the limited space which even your handsome saloon affords?”

Indeed, when we got up on deck, the rain, for which Mr. Brown declared himself so anxious, seemed further off than ever. The Kittiwake was already speeding away southward from Oban, her tall white sails filled with a brisk westerly breeze, and overhead there was a dark blue sky that had its light reflected in the ruffled plain that lay all around us. Out before us—for we went round Kerrara before going south—the lofty mountains of Mull were gradually becoming more distinct, until we could see the glimmering of streams in the deep gullies, and here and there a small white cottage along the lonely shores. In our wake stretched the far-reaching arms of Loch Etive and Loch Linnhe—long blue creeks lying underneath the wild mountains of Morven and Appin, and embracing the lower and greener hills of Lismore. It was a fair and beautiful picture—the brisk blue ripple of the water, the innumerable islands, the flocks of sea-birds floating on the waves or dashing this way and that against the westerly winds, while up in the north stood the calm and silent rampart of the mountains, touched here and there with the shadow of a cloud.

“There is no sign of rain,” remarked Mr. Brown, scanning the horizon with a wistful glance. “That haze you see along the mountains is never accompanied by rain, and yet there was rain last night.”

He turned with a well-simulated sigh to light a cigar, and then he caught sight of a bundle of newspapers that had been brought on board that morning. Lazily he opened them; but suddenly he announced to us, in a voice of astonishment, that the Lords had thrown out the Ballot Bill. Weyland, sitting by the tiller, looked up. I became apprehensive of a skirmish between the Member for Slow and the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh.

“Poor old things,” said Mr. Brown, with an accent of contemptuous tenderness. “I don’t wonder at their being in a hurry for their holidays; and nobody ought to grudge them the sense of importance with which they will now go down into the country. It will be something to keep up the spirits of the amiable old gentlemen as they drive about the country roads in closed-up old-fashioned yellow chariots, and answer with a paralytic nod the salutations of the farmers. I hope the old gentlemen will keep up their system and get strong. They will want some strength of digestion next Session for the operation known as eating the leek.”

The wrath on Weyland’s face was terrible to look upon, and he was fairly speechless with rage. The Glasgow bailie turned from the one to the other with uneasy glances, probably fearing that Mr. Weyland might in the recklessness of passion shoot the Kittiwake high and dry on the nearest island.

“Perhaps,” said the Member for Slow, with a wild and ghastly effort to accomplish a smile, “you will introduce a Bill for the removal of the House of Lords to Hanwell. Or perhaps you’d have them sent to a pauper school to teach them how to write their own names.”

“Most of ’em can’t,” said Mr. Brown coolly. He was trying to make out whether a certain big bird, down near Ardincaple Point, was a gull or a solan.

“I am not surprised at anything that is done by the Liberal party,” said Mr. Weyland hotly, “when I hear the perfectly reckless and inconsiderate way in which individual members talk of the most vital institutions of the country—as if they were mere footballs to be kicked about for the convenience of a Premier or the amusement of a session. I do not know whether it is thoughtlessness or ignorance——”

The bird had gone down with a sudden rush, and we could see the water leap thirty feet into the air after the fierce plunge. Then the snow-white long-winged solan rose once more, made one or two slow circles, and finally came sailing up toward the north. Mr. Brown darted down to the cabin; and presently reappeared with a double-barrelled breechloader in his hand.

“If I could only get one of those magnificent birds,” said he, “I’d give up the notion of making a collection. When you have got the King, you do not care about the Court.”

And, in truth, this particular solan, forgetting the shyness of its tribe, seemed determined to give Mr. Brown a chance. It flew at great height, but it came slowly up in a direct line across the boat.—Mr. Brown’s eyes were fixed with a painful anxiety on the slow pinions of the gannet as it came nearer and nearer; and he was heard to whisper an agitated question as to whether a swan-shot cartridge would reach that height. None of us dared answer him; even Weyland had forgotten the cruelties heaped on the House of Lords in the excitement caused by the approach of the solan. Mr. Brown stealthily put up the gun to his shoulder—just as if he were some fat old sportsman in the Black Forest nervously expecting the appearance of a roebuck. So dazzling was the clear blue that it was difficult to follow the slow flight of the large bird; and it seemed to be overhead while yet Mr. Brown would not fire. Mr. Weyland began to be agitated about the safety of the rigging, and would probably have interposed but that the startling bang of Mr. Brown’s right barrel told us that the great event was decided one way or the other.

“I have shot him—I have killed him—I have smashed him up!” shouted the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh, with the most unstatesmanlike and unsportsmanlike eagerness. Certainly the bird had disappeared to leeward. Mr. Brown sprung behind the mainsail, and lo! some hundred yards ahead, an immense white thing floated on the water. He shouted that the bird was dead. He implored Weyland to get a small boat ready. He gave various orders, couched in the language of Cockaigne, to the astonished sailors, who had been regarding the falling solan with little interest. And then, in the middle of all this turmoil, a loud laugh was heard from Weyland, and the solan was seen to flutter up from the water and continue its flight.

Despair fell over the countenance of my amiable friend,

He did not utter a word ; but he was calmly relinquishing himself to his fate, when the solan was seen to "tower" for a few yards. Mr. Brown apparently imagined that this natural phenomenon was but the beginning of a long excursion on the part of the solan, and was, indeed, turning away in disgust, when the bird fell straight into the water, and floated on the waves a lifeless and dishevelled mass of feathers. Some few minutes afterward, Mr. Brown was regarding with inexpressible delight and wonder the monster of the deep which lay before him, with its snow-white wings extended on the deck. He called our attention to the beautiful colors on its long and powerful beak, to the shading on its legs, to the immense breadth of its wings. One of the men further gratified Mr. Brown by informing him that the wings of the solan were sometimes found to be seven feet across, and that no other bird so much resembled an albatross. The hero of the hour regarded his prize with a new interest—there were wild and poetical ideas and association about this magnificent creature that he had brought down. It was with some hesitation that it allowed it to be taken below, Weyland giving orders that it should be packed and forwarded to Glasgow by the first steamer they could intercept. Mr. Brown hoped they were able to stuff large birds in Glasgow.

The slaughter of the solan was a fortunate thing for us all. Mr. Brown's geniality, in consequence of his exploit, was excessive ; nothing could exceed his politeness, his good-nature, and his efforts to amuse us. He doubtless felt that we ought all to share in his joy, and he even went the length of tendering a formal apology to Mr. Weyland for his remarks about the House of Lords, which the Member for Slow accepted with one of his prodigious laughs. And so, in this delightful state of affairs, the long summer day passed pleasantly, and we gradually drew down toward Jura, keeping well outside the island of Garveloch and Scarba. Here we experienced a rather heavy sea ; but the Kittiwake conducted herself with propriety, and Mr. Brown, though he was occasionally silent and solemn, never had to go below.

Out to windward lay the desolate-looking islands of Colonsay and Oronsay, amid the ceaseless wash of the Atlantic. Why that lengthy ballad of Dr. Leyden should have taken such hold of my friend from the South it was impossible to say ; but he continued to gaze on the bleak and distant shores of Colonsay all the time we were creeping along the coast of Jura. And when at last we anchored in Loch Tar-bert, and found almost over our heads the immense and gloomy peaks that are known to fishermen as the Paps of Jura, we could see that the "Song of Colonsay" was still sounding its melancholy refrain in the ears of Mr. Brown. But whenever he grew too sad, the least mention of the solan woke him up into life again; and all that evening, as we sat on deck, and smoked, and watched the stars glimmering on the sea around us, that was black as night with the shadows of the mountains, his talk was of the wonders of the deep that are known to sailors, and of the rough sports and enjoyments that might be got at if one were only young enough to become a middy.

CHAPTER IX.

DEER-STALKING IN JURA.

A COLD gray mist was rising off the bay, and masses of watery-looking clouds were slowly creeping up the dark sides of the mountains, when Mr. Brown, M. P., stepped on deck and took his accustomed glance round, apparently to see if there was a chance of rain. The prospect was gloomy. The waters of the sound were rough and gray; Islay was half hidden in mist; and overhead there was a dense pall of vapor through which the sun could not pierce. Despite the fact that the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh had been longing for rain, in order that he might devote himself to the question of the Customs Clerks' grievances, he did not seem pleased to find it so near. He looked at the clean deck and spars of the Kittiwake, and complained that a yacht looked clammy on a cold morning. With a morose sort of poetry he compared her to a sea-bird floating on the water in time of rain, with her wings folded closely up, and her appearance dejected. He remarked that there was much gloomy grandeur about the Jura mountains; but that, once you had seen them, there was no use in remaining under their cold and oppressive shadows. He observed that the sound of Jura was a melancholy piece of water; and was of opinion that the Hebrides generally seemed a sterile region, visited by fogs and rains and the cold wash of the sea.

But a great surprise was in store for my friend. While we were regarding the desolate prospect around us, the gig of the Kittiwake was observed to be coming out from the shore; and in the stem sat Mr. Weyland himself. There was a bluff satisfaction in his face. He sprung up the gangway quite lightly, and slapped Mr. Brown on the back.

“You’ve heard me speak of Maclean of Hulishtaveg?” he said,

“No, I have not,” replied Mr. Brown, coldly, for he did not like to be slapped on the back.

“No matter, he sends you his compliments in very good English, and offers you as much red deer shooting as you like, and says you will find men, dogs, and guns awaiting us up at Glen-cona an hour hence.”

“Red deer!” exclaimed Mr. Brown, with an awestruck look.

And with that he darted down the companion to see if breakfast was laid. He implored us to make haste. He scalded his mouth with coffee. He said it would have been hard if we had gone away from the Hebrides without slaying a red deer, and talked with such animation and excitement about that noble sport, and about the grandeur of this lonely island of Jura, and of the more than royal hospitality exercised by the brave and courteous Highland gentlemen who live in those wilds, that we half expected to see tears of admiration start into his eyes. Weyland improved the time by detailing the qualifications of the deer-stalker—how that he must have the eye of a hawk, the pertinacity of a sleuth-hound, the footing of a chamois—how that he must be brave and patient, nimble and agile, and prepared to suffer any privation. We observed that as Mr. Brown rose to go upon deck before us, he buttoned his coat tightly round what was once a waist, erected his head, and assumed a look of bright and sharp activity. His efforts to improve his figure, however, were a failure.

It took us nearly an hour to reach the little white cottage which had been pointed out to us as Glen-cona—a solitary building, perched upon an open space of morass which led the way into a deep gap between the hills. Not only were the gillies and dogs in readiness, but the Maclean himself—a tall and spare-built man, with long white hair and flowing beard—had come up from his house to receive his friend’s friends,

This he did with a simple and yet stately courtesy which greatly impressed Mr. Brown, who subsequently informed us that he could not help thinking the old man with the white beard, and the lofty manners and the peculiar inflection of English, was a descendant of Ossian. Hulishtaveg was not in the kilt, but his gillies were—the big, weather-tanned men who stood silently by, except when they rebuked one of the shaggy and splendid-looking deerhounds, and who received from their master a glass of whisky, which was no great length of time in reaching its destination. When the Maclean had given the men certain instructions in what was apparently graphic and forcible Gaelic, he bade us farewell in a few words of very fair English, and took his departure.

Weyland now impressed on the head-keeper that everything was to be done to give Mr. Brown a shot—that he was to be considered the chief of the party. When the swarthy and bearded Highlander was at length made to understand this, he simply laid hold of Mr. Brown and treated him as if he were a child, with a quiet, good-natured patronage that my friend knew not how to resent. In the first place, he insisted on the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh leaving behind him a white coat which he wore, and putting on instead a brown jacket which one of the gillies was ordered to strip off his shoulders. Mr. Brown objected, but his protestations were of no avail.

“Cash pless me!” said the keeper, “it will pe for no use if you go up sa hill wi’ a big, white, starin’ coat on, that will pe seen through the length and sa preadth o’ Jura. Wass you neffer after sa deer afore?”

Mr. Brown had to confess that he had never before hunted the wild deer or followed the roe; whereupon the big keeper helped my friend into the gillie’s jacket, and slung a telescope over his shoulder, and bound a cartridge-belt round his waist; but the rifle which was apportioned to him was handed over to one of the men. Then we set out. Mr. Brown grinned a ghastly grin over his costume and accoutrements; but he was evidently feeling a little nervous.

For the first part of our journey our way lay along a marshy hollow that formed the base of two hills. Not a word was spoken; there was nothing to break the profound stillness of this solitary glen; we could not even hear a stream trickling down the mountain-side. Then after a long and patient tramp, we began to ascend the hill—in some places so steep that our hands were about as serviceable as our feet. What with hopping over bits of bog, and climbing over rocks, and working through heather, Mr. Brown was looking rather exhausted as we neared the summit; but a halt was called, and the plan of operations stealthily formed.

The Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh now became the hero of the hour, for it was to him that the keeper chiefly addressed, in cautious whispers, certain directions as to what should be done. These two, indeed, now left the party, and slowly and silently climbed up to a ridge of rock that no doubt commanded the valley beyond. Both were prone on the heather and apparently motionless, when the keeper, having slowly swept the space before him with his glass, touched Mr. Brown's arm and indicated that he should look in a particular direction. What was the meaning of that next abrupt movement? Mr. Brown had hastily dropped his telescope, and took up his rifle; but the keeper instantly seized the latter, took it off the rock, and turned to his companion with a look of anger and surprise.

"Cash pless me!" we heard him exclaim in an excited whisper. "Wass you going to fire? Sa stag iss a mile away and more, and a' sa hinds are watchin' up by sa burn. You will have to go down sa hill again, and along sa glen, and up by sa burn,—it will be three miles you will go afore you wass to get near him."

But nothing would daunt Mr. Brown, now that he had seen his quarry. In mingled trepidation and excitement he came back and told us upon what an awful venture he was setting out. We agreed to watch his progress from the ambush on the top of the hill; while he and the keeper and a gillie with the dogs went off on their circuit so as to get at the stag. He left us his telescope, and took with him our blessing.

More than an hour elapsed before we caught sight of them, and then we made out three tiny figures stealing along the opposite hillside. A sharp and deep little glen lay between them and the open space where the stag was quietly browsing; and it was evident that the success of the expedition depended on Mr. Brown being able to get into this glen and up again without attracting the attention of his prey. A grave and watchful gillie who followed every movement with intensest interest expressed his opinion that the "shentleman tid not know much of sa shooting and would pe sure to make a noise among sa rocks." At length we saw Mr. Brown, creeping on hands and knees, gain the edge of the ravine and disappear. The stag still stood about thirty yards from the other side of the glen, in an open space where there were some gray rocks among the heather, while two or three hinds were on a grassy plateau above him, walking about and occasionally nibbling the herbage. Our excitement was now so great that no one spoke. A dead silence prevailed. Suddenly there was a light pattering heard near us, and the next moment a hind came cantering down in front of us. The moment she saw us a sort of paralysis seemed to overtake her. She halted for one second, all her limbs quivering; then she was off with the speed of lightning, followed by two hinds and two stags that had been quietly coming on in Indian file. All this had occurred in an instant; and in the same instant Weyland had started up, cocked his rifle, and fired. The gillie fired. The second stag, at which the gillie had shot, gave one spring into the air and tumbled forward lifeless; but the first stag, Weyland's quarry, after having gone down on its foreknees, struggled up again, and was seen to make straight down the hill. "Oh, sa tawgs, sa tawgs, what for had we no sa tawgs wi us, tamernation and diabhol!" shouted the gillie, and then he dashed down the hillside after the wounded deer, Weyland himself, long-legged and active, vainly endeavoring to keep up with his extraordinary speed. When they had disappeared, I turned to the other valley, where also the crack of a rifle had been heard. What was that distant and corpulent little figure doing, but waving a handkerchief and dancing a wild fandango of delight, while the gillie was hauling off the hounds that were apparently bent on attacking some brown object lying there? Apparently the man had divined that the dogs might be wanted elsewhere, for presently we saw him disappear with them round the head of the glen, while Mr. Brown, still waving a handkerchief, descended to the burn, crossed over and slowly began to ascend the hill. Long before he had reached the top he had shouted the joyous news, and when he arrived, speechless, smothered in perspiration, covered with brown moss-water, and dishevelled beyond expression, he reserved his last energies for a wild performance of a Highland reel, and then sunk, glorious and happy, on the heather.

"Killed him—killed him—killed him!" he cried, "dead as a stone—big as a house—want two ponies to fetch him home—I'll have him stuffed if I pay a thousand pounds for it!"

"With a gold medal slung round his neck—Shot by Pisistratus Brown, Esq., M. P., in the mountains of Jura, August, 1871.

Mr. Brown lay on the heather, took deep draughts of the clear and cool air, and rubbed his hands. Already he pictured to himself the noble animal standing in the hall of a certain house in Holland Park, the admiration and wonder of all visitors. He was too much excited, indeed, to give any account of how he had shot the deer, and that did not leak out until Weyland, the head-keeper, and the gillie with the dogs had all returned to us. They, too, were in an exultant mood. The hounds had hunted down the wounded stag until they had brought him to bay, and he was found facing them, when Weyland got up in time to give him another bullet. The gillie had brought down a very tolerable stag, but Weyland's prey turned out to be a hart of magnificent proportions, with horns that the keeper described in technical language which considerably puzzled the Member for Bourten-in-the-Marsh. When we came to ask what sort of horns he had secured, there came the ominous confession that the animal he had shot was not adorned in that way.

"It wass a hind," said the keeper, with some contempt. "Sa stag will pe neffer touched at all."

"But you can't deny it's a deer," said Mr. Brown, almost fiercely, "and if I didn't get the stag, whose fault was it, Donald, or Duncan, or MacTavish or whatever is your name? Answer me that! The plain story, Weyland, is simply this—that your confounded shooting startled the stag just as I was getting up to the edge. The beggar was off before you could have winked—like a flash of powder—and I saw him join the whole herd of 'em, and off they went. What could I do? By Jove, I banged into the lot of 'em, just as any man would, and you should have seen the cracker that deer went when I caught him——"

"Her," said Weyland, cruelly.

"Her or him, what's the difference? You may talk of spires and harts, and stags and calves; but all I know is I've shot a deer, and as that sort of thing doesn't fall in my way every day, I may confess that I'm uncommonly proud of it, and, with the permission of Allasterbeg, or whatever the mischief you call him, I propose to give these Macdonalds, and Macdougals, and MacTavishes here a sovereign apiece."

Mr. Brown now became anxious that the two ponies which had been sent for should arrive, that we might go down the glen in triumph; but as the day had worn on with our repeated delays, it was resolved to go down quietly to Mr. Maclean's house, and carry him on board the Kittiwake. Hulishtaveg was well pleased with the story of the day's performances, and remarked, on the good fortune which had attended what was, after all an experiment.

"Sa morn's morning," he said to Mr. Brown, "you will pe early afoot, and teil sa fears but you will come home wis a fine good stag—as good as any one in Jura."

"I will get up at three o'clock," said Mr. Brown, eagerly; "and you know, Mr. Maclean, I am a stranger to this sort of thing, and if, after dinner, you could give me a hint or two, you know——"

Hulishtaveg gave us after dinner something much better—a Gaelic song about a young person called Maggie, who was asked to marry a certain red-haired William; and this he sung in a shrill, quavering voice that had some faint resemblance to the reediness of the bagpipes.

CHAPTER X.

DEER-DRIVING IN JURA

THE cold light of the dawn was beginning to steal down; into the glens, and there was a faint saffron color becoming visible in the sky, far over the tops of the mountains, when Mr. Brown, M. P., stood on the deck of the Kittiwake and saw the gig being lowered. Much of the enthusiasm of the previous evening had gone. The visions begotten of Hulishtaveg's stories of deer-stalking, salmon-spearing, and otto-hunting were now cold, and gray, and faint in the clear light of the early morning; and Mr. Brown was no longer ready to scoff at late sleepers, and to expatiate on the delight of getting out of bed while the mists were still in the valleys and the darkness not yet lifted off the far and murmuring plain of the sea. He was very silent, and even gloomy; and, as he sat in the stern of the pinnace, looked wistfully over to the distant shores of Islay, where man and nature seemed still buried in sleep.

The Member for Slow, more accustomed to sportsman's hours, was, on the contrary, full of facetious humors, and strove to impress on Mr. Brown the awful nature of the excitement experienced by the man who finds deer running by in front of him, while he endeavors to single out the finest hart for his shot. He impressed on his friend, too, the gratitude he owed to Maclean of Hulishtaveg for getting up this drive in his honor—a form of deer-shooting rarely resorted to in Jura on account of the number of men required, and the tendency it has to make the deer wild and frighten them into neighboring territory.

“I daresay the old man started at two o’clock this morning to arrange the drive,” remarked Mr. Weyland. “And how would you like going up those wild glens in the middle of the night, with mist-clouds making the most familiar places dangerous to you.”

“I don’t see the necessity,” said the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh, morosely. “You don’t expect to catch the deer asleep, do you? And when you turn a man out at four o’clock and thrust him into the raw air of the morning, and make him swallow his breakfast before he has got any appetite, you upset him for the day, that’s all. You may call it sport; I call it a mistake. I can get up as early as most men, when there’s any need; but to be lugged out in the middle of the night merely because it’s considered fine, and sportsmanlike, and heroic, is a very different thing. I would very much rather have spent the next two hours in studying those grievances of the Customs clerks, and getting some useful work done. However, as that old idiot of a Highlander, I dare say, has been rampaging about the whole country-side since midnight, I suppose we needn’t waste any time in getting up to the starting-point.”

It was most ungenerous of Mr. Brown to speak thus of his benefactor, who had not only arranged for him a day’s sport such as few men, be they Princes or Cabinet Ministers, are privileged to enjoy, but had also sent down a horse and two ponies for us. The Glasgow bailie was to have accompanied us; but on rousing him about 3.30 he had uttered the most solemn vows that he would see us anywhere before he would budge an inch, so that we had to leave him to his inglorious rest. Accordingly the horse and the ponies carried us picturesquely, if not comfortably, up to Glen cona, where we found Hulishtaveg, one or two gillies, and the dogs. The rest of the gillies and hillmen had started long before for a district lying considerably beyond that in which we had been successful the day before. No time was to be lost. We got into the saddle again—Mr. Maclean stoutly resisting Weyland's invitation to change places with him—and set off up the marshy glen that led into the mountains.

In reply to Mr. Brown, Hulishtaveg informed us that we should have a terrible hot day; but in the meantime the morning was clear and rather chilly. There was a rawness in the air around us, although far overhead we could see the sunlight strike the eastward-looking peaks of the mountains. But the jolting of the white pony which he bestrode had brought some warmth into Mr. Brown's frame; and a tolerably lengthy pull at a whisky-flask, which had gone the round of the circle at Glen-cona, had brought more liveliness into his eye and talk. He began to feel more sure about being able to distinguish between a hind and a hart as the deer went by. He was quite certain he would not fire prematurely, and kill some harmless little animal running in front of its mother. He would take the greatest care not to frighten the hinds, so that they might turn and drive back the stags. Not for the world would he spoil sport.

"And, mirover," said old Hulishtaveg, in his shrill and curious English, "it may pe sa stags will come first. When sey get a great fright, sometimes sa stag will come afore sa hinds, espaycially if he sinks some danger is apout; and all you will do, Mester Prown, iss no to put yoursel' into a hurry, but tek your time—tek your time—and fire weel forrit."

"I'll fire a yard ahead of 'em," said Mr. Brown confidentially. "Only give me a chance, and you'll see."

"A chance?" said the old Highlandman rather testily, "no man will pe able to make a chance for you if sa deer will not be inclined to go your way; but sa men knaw as much apoot sa deer as ony men in sa country; and if you do not get a fine, big, braw pair o' horns, it will pe your own fault, sir, neversales and mirover."

When, at length, we had got within about a mile of our points of ambush we dismounted, and the horse and ponies were left in charge of a small kilted youth. Then the gillies—all but he with the dogs—went off to join in that gentle pressing of the deer in a particular direction, which is a much more difficult business than merely shooting at them when they come to you. The manner in which a few men, keepign themselves, as a rule, invisible, will succeed in driving a herd of deer in a certain line is most marvellous, and is all the more so that the exploit is so seldom performed. The Maclean himself undertook to post the three strangers; and when this was done, and we had all received ample instructions and injunctions, the old man departed, rifle in hand, to seek out a corner for himself. His whispered directions were the last sound we heard: then followed the strange and dead stillness that reigned over the broad valley, and we were left to peer anxiously from our hiding-places and await the coming of the deer.

I could see the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh. He was placed behind a rock in a little ravine, which had once been the bed of a stream. He had placed his cap by his side, so that he might peep over the boulders before him, and his shining bald head gleamed like a piece of smooth quartz down among the gray shadows of schist. He was furnished with a double-barrel breachloading rifle that Weyland had had made for him in Edinburgh; and he had received the most impressive instructions not to fire within a mile of my station should the deer chance to escape him and come up that way. Weyland, with a gillie and deerhounds, was posted so far as we could make out Hulishtavig's explanation, on the other side of the hill, in the direction the deer were likely to take if fired at by us.

How long we waited it is impossible to say. It seemed ages, it was probably hours. At last there appeared by the side of a lump of rock high up on the opposite hill the flutter of a white handkerchief which was instantly withdrawn—the signal that the deer were in sight. Mr. Brown put the barrels of his gun carefully on the ledge before him.

And then, in the deathlike silence, we saw the first of the deer appear. They were two full-grown hinds and a calf, that came lightly and gently centering over the moss and heather, stopping now and again, to ~~go~~ back, with their ears erect, and their long lithe throats arching up to their small heads. Presently came three more hinds, in single file and then two stags, a small one and a large one, the latter with splendid horns. It was an exciting moment; for it was impossible to say which way they might go. They had evidently been alarmed by the gillies somewhere; but to so slight a degree that they trotted gently, and stopped every two or three seconds to look back, which they did with their nostrils high in the air, and their ears thrown forward. A more picturesque group was never painted by Landseer; but what we chiefly thought of, doubtless, was their distance from us.

As we watched them, in this anxious fashion, one of the hinds trotted of to the right and the others at some distance followed her, one by one. They were now apparently going straight over the opposite hill, and how was one gillie to intercept them? Suddenly we saw him start from his hiding-place, throw his jacket into the air and halloo at the pitch of his voice. The whole herd now sprang down the hill, and headed down the glen. Here another gillie started from some unknown ambush; and the stags, now in front, turned once more and made straight for our place of hiding. Now or never was our chance. On they came with those light elastic strides that seemed to skip the ground, the smaller stag now leading. How different was this terrible pace from the slow rambling of the pasteboard stag at Wimbledon, which Mr. Brown had been declaring the night before, he could hit in the heart five times out of six! But if the pace was trying, the line they took was advantageous; and in far less time than it has taken to write these words they were upon us. Bang! went Mr. Brown's first barrel. The smaller stag cleared the rocky channel at one leap; and was making down into the hollow of the glen, when a shot—from a quarter which modesty directs shall be nameless—sent him headfirst into a patch of long green grass that surrounded a mountain spring. Almost simultaneously with that shot, Mr. Brown fired his second barrel, and lo! the larger stag did actually stumble forward and then fall heavily on his side. Mr. Brown uttered a startling yell, and dashed down the rocky chasm, over boulders and stones. The stag rose on his forefeet, and again it fell. In vain I shouted to my frantic friend not to go near the deer; for the next moment I saw him aim a blow at the ~~head~~ his adversary with the butt of Weyland's valuable rifle, Again and again the excited sportsman flourished his weapon, and then he sat down on the slain deer's neck, and took hold of its antlers, and waved the butt of the rifle over his head.

“Why,” said he, when I got up, “did you ever see the like of that? Two stags—one with each barrel!”

I calmly regarded my friend. He blushed a little, and then said, uneasily,—

“Do you think you shot the first one?”

“Do you think you shot it?” I asked.

He looked away for a second or two; and then he said, reflectively,— “Perhaps, after all, I may have been mistaken. At all events I can afford to give you that one. I have enough. I wouldn't quarrel with any one about a wretched deer. The man who spoils a day's sport by claiming what isn't his own—bah! I have no patience with him. Well, what is the matter?"

The last words were uttered rather angrily. The fact was that Mr. Brown had put out one of his legs over the fallen deer, but not so artistically as to conceal the fact that the stag had been shot in the hind legs—the ball going through both, and smashing them.

"If you consider," said he, "the pace he was going at, the wonder is that any mortal man could have got near him. I'm not proud. I hit a deer where I can; and I'm satisfied if I kill him. I suppose it isn't every man who can say that out of three shots he killed two deer, eh?"

Indeed, Mr. Brown, M.P., forgot this flaw in his happiness, amid the universal congratulations of his companions. He would not, he said, trouble Mr. Maclean's gillies to go any further that day. He was satisfied. Sport, not indiscriminate slaughter, was his object. And there and then he invited all the gillies to a supper at Glen-cona, and forthwith begged Weyland to lend him a dozen of champagne. Of that supper, which came off about eight o'clock, it is impossible to speak here. Certainly no more strange, and motley, and picturesque gathering was ever before summoned to drink dry sillery amid the dusky solitudes of Jura.

CHAPTER XI.

GROUSE-SHOOTING IN JURA.

It is not every day that a Highland laird has the opportunity of entertaining two members of our Imperial Legislature; and whether it was that circumstance, or merely the amiable temperament of Mr. Brown, M.P., that affected Hulishtaveg, certain it is that the chieftain was excessively courteous to us. Not content with allowing the strangers from the Kittiwake to slay his deer, he now proposed that the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh should undertake a day's grouse-shooting. Mr. Brown regarded this invitation with a complacent serenity. It was a compliment to his powers as a sportsman. It is true he spoke in rather a contemptuous tone about grouse. The man who was able to bring down a stag at full speed might be pardoned for considering the whole grouse family, even including the capercailze, as rather small game. But Mr. Brown was not proud. He thanked the Maclean with a gracious politeness, and said he would go on the next morning, if it did not rain.

“A trap o’ rain will not do much harm,” said the old Highlander, unnecessarily taking a look round the horizon, on which all the evidences of settled weather were apparent. “You wass very fortunate, mirover, wis your two days at sa deer. You will not expect to have aye such goot weather among sa Jura hills.”

“But you don’t understand, Mr. Maclean,” said my friend, gravely. “A Member of Parliament, whether he be in the Cabinet or a mere outsider, never wholly gets rid of his duties by leaving town. A portion of his leisure, at least, he owes to his countrymen. And I am now investigating a most important question, with a view to remedying a great grievance—that, namely, of the capricious and unsatisfactory manner in which salaries are awarded to her Majesty’s clerks of Customs in the East of London and elsewhere. Should a change in the weather occur I must devote myself to this matter, grouse or no grouse, red deer or no red deer.”

“Oh, ferry well, ferry well,” said old Hulishtaveg, “no goot will come to sa man who neglects his pusiness for his amusements, mirover.”

On this occasion there was no picturesque procession of ponies and gillies, for our beat began about half a mile from the bay in which the Kittiwake was moored. Most of this half mile lay round the shore; and Mr. Brown—as he listened vaguely to Weyland’s comparison of the virtues of pointers and setters—let his eye rove over the blue expanse of sea that lay smooth and still around the coasts of Islay. The Sound, that is generally swept by currents of wind coming down the gorge between the Jura mountains and the Islay shore, was almost glass-like. There was scarcely a breath of wind, and it was apparent that we should have warm work of it on the moors.

“Why here is Mr. Maclean again,” said Mr. Brown, as we neared the trysting-place. “The old man seems to think we could not start without his coming to see us off, and give us a glass of whisky. I wonder if he thinks a Member of Parliament an extraordinary creature.”

I ventured to hint to Mr. Brown that Hulishtaveg's courtesy took its rise in the immemorial traditions of his class, and was not dictated by a profound reverence for the British Parliament. Doubtless, however, the old man was not displeased to see his name in the Edinburgh and Glasgow papers as the host of the representatives of two important English boroughs.

Hulishtaveg wished us good luck, and then we set off for the base of the nearest hill, accompanied by two gillies, a boy, two brace of setters, a pointer and a retriever. The head keeper explained to us that this pointer, which had been presented to Hulishtaveg by an English gentleman, was a steady old dog that was likely to be of excellent service to the central gun, when the setters were ranging rather wildly. Mr. Brown remarked that he did not care with what sort of dog he shot. He was also indifferent as to whether he were placed on the right, or on the left, or in the middle. He put a couple of cartridges into the barrels of his breech-loader, flung the gun up on his shoulder with quite a jaunty air, and stalked forward erect and confident.

Indeed, Mr. Brown lost none of this ease of manner when a brace of the setters were uncoupled and we began to move cautiously along a piece of swampy ground lying at the base of a slope of heather.

"Those setters have been badly trained," he remarked, with a cool air. "They are wild. They will put up the birds out of shot. I can foresee that they will. When once we reach the dryer ground, where the grouse are sure to be——"

He never finished the sentence. Old Dan the pointer, who had given himself but one or two brief preliminary scampers, was suddenly seen to curb his pace; and then, after carefully advancing a few yards, he became motionless. As we quickly and stealthily went up to him, he moved not a muscle of his rigid frame—his neck and head stretched forward, his tail stiff as a rod behind, his fore leg hanging motionless in the air. As we got near him, he began to draw on the birds; and, knowing that grouse run swiftly when caught in grassy cover we were looking well forward, when a magnificent whirr almost underneath Dun's nose was followed by a hurried bang from Mr. Brown's gun. A heap of feathers tumbled on to the ground; and my excitable friend—forgetting the example he was showing to the dogs—rushed madly toward the spot, caught the bird, and flourished it in the air.

But there was one man more excited than Mr. Brown, and that was the keeper. In his first alarm and rage at seeing my companion put up his gun to shoot a black-cock, he had yelled out in Gaelic, and now, in the same language, he was expostulating with Mr. Brown on the appalling nature of his conduct, while Weyland had positively to sit down on a tuft of heather to give vent to prodigious roars of laughter. Mr. Brown looked deeply hurt,

“What have I done?” he said.

In the mildest manner Weyland pointed out that he had fired at a bird which, had it been a grouse, would have belonged to me; that he had killed a black-cock after being warned that the time for shooting that animal had not arrived; and that he had acted in a manner sufficient to have demoralized the best setters or pointers ever bred and trained.

“But, at all events, I have killed the bird,” said Mr. Brown, gloomily.

He moved forward with less gayety of demeanor now. The setters which, in spite of his example, had dropped very prettily when the birds rose, now recommenced their light and active labors, and the grave and more cautious Dan, keeping nearer at home, worked the ground between them in a most satisfactory manner. We were now getting up the hill toward a level plateau, and were near the brow of the ascent when we flushed our first covey. They rose to Mr. Brown's side, perhaps at a distance of about twenty yards and after a start caused by the sudden noise, and a stumbling about the stock of the gun, as if it had caught in his waistcoat, we were surprised to see the long steel barrels pointing in the direction of the now disappearing grouse, and Mr. Brown pulling at the trigger, without a vestige of sound following. Then, with a fearful exclamation of anger, my companion took down the breech-loader and looked at it. He had forgotten to put in a cartridge in place of the one fired at the black-cock—indeed, the hammer was still down on the barrel. Weyland did not laugh this time; he was too much annoyed. Mr. Brown's moroseness deepened, and we went on.

One or two members of the covey had loitered behind in the heather on the brow of the hill. Of these a brace fell to Weyland's gun, and one bird, getting up out of shot, made after its companions. There we resolved on following, but taking care to miss nothing on the way.

It appeared that the covey had been well scattered, for we had just rounded one shoulder of the hill, when up got a fine bird from under a big mass of rock that jutted out from the hillside. This, also, was Mr. Brown's bird but two barrels sent after him scarcely caused him to swerve from his course, and we could see the sunlight shimmering on his outstretched and tremulous wings as he sailed round the entrance into the next valley. Weyland said nothing. Mr. Brown was silent. But as we once more moved on, the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh, apparently grown reckless, began to hum carelessly, "A life on the Ocean Wave."

"I wish you'd stop that row, and give other people a chance, if you can't shoot yourself," said Weyland, half in joke and half in irritated earnest.

"At all events," said Mr. Brown, stopping short and drawing himself up, "at all events, I expected to go shooting with gentlemen."

"Gentlemen be hanged!" said the Member for Slow; and, at the same moment one of the setters came to a point. The other setters creeping forward a little too zealously, the birds sprung up. Four of them fell; the fifth went straight past Mr. Brown, at a distance of about thirty-five yards, and sailed across the valley to the opposite mountain.

"Why didn't you fire?" asked Weyland of Mr. Brown when the retriever had brought back one of the birds that had only been winged.

Mr. Brown did not answer. He glanced carelessly round, as if admiring the warm tints of the hills, and the effect of the sunlight on the rocks and heather. Then he said, with a slight air of contempt,—

"I do not see the attractions of a sport that is marked by indiscriminate slaughter, and by a good deal of ill-temper. I do not desire to be proficient in it. I can dispense with the fame of being an accomplished butcher of harmless birds. You may think it fine to kill grouse in that fashion; but I would as soon shoot pigeons at Hurlingham."

"Shoot at them, you mean," said Mr. Weyland, cruelly; and then the Member for Slow went over to his friend, and pacified him, and apologized to him, and got him into a good humor. This incident took up a little time; but the fact was that the terrible heat which was now beating down made such stoppages far from ungrateful. Even Donald, the keeper, remarked with a sigh, as he mopped his face with his weatherbeaten bonnet, "It iss a most terrible warm tay, as ever was seen." The redintegratio amoris between the two faithful friends who had fallen out was marked by the passing round of a flask of Lagavulin, and again we urged on our wild career.

Certainly, there was no lack of sport. The birds were plentiful, far from wild, and we were lucky enough to get the coveys well broken up, and odd birds scored down, before attacking new districts. But Mr. Brown never recovered from the demoralization of his first mistakes. After failing altogether to fire at one or two birds that offered him easy shots, he was counselled to wake up his spirits by a dose of that mellow liquid which had its origin in the island lying over there in the blue sea. It is to be feared that the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh took the advice too much to heart, or it may have been that the Lagavulin had an unusual effect on a system weakened by the extreme heat, by disappointment, and despair. Mr. Brown, M. P., took two deep draughts from his own particular flask, and thereupon declared that the day was but young yet. He had made some blunders, doubtless; but his hand was out. He said there was nothing more beautiful than to see a setter work the side of a hill in the stillness of the midday sun.

Mr. Brown had just made this remark—in an unnecessarily loud voice—when, some distance ahead, a large black-cock got up with a prodigious clatter, and betook himself to the heights above. Mr. Brown jumped, but did not put up his gun. "Well done!" said Weyland, approvingly. Alas! the very next moment there rose a gray hen, and Mr. Brown, being deceived by the color, fired hastily. What was our astonishment to see the bird—which was certainly fifty yards off—drop like a stone! When Mr. Brown was told what he had done; he took no more shame to himself. He snapped his fingers, and uttered a fiendish laugh.

"Black-cock, white-cock," he said, gayly, "red grouse or gray grouse, ptarmigan, snipe, capercailzie, or stags a hundred feet high, I'll kill 'em all—I'll kill 'em all."

The Member for Slow regarded his friend with a stupefied air.

"Come along," said Mr. Brown lightly. "What's the use of drawing fine distinctions? We're outraging all humanitarian notions in making the killing of birds an amusement, and we may as well go in for unbridled license. What can a few days matter to a black-cock? Come along—let's have plenty of shooting—at anything! Wake 'em up, old MacPhairson or MacDuncan or whatever they call you. Ha!"

And bang went Mr. Brown's gun at a fine cock grouse which his loud talking had put up almost out of range. Yet again the reckless Member of Parliament brought down his quarry; and again he uttered a wild laugh of triumph.

"You can't deny that's a grouse, can you?" he exclaimed, fiercely thrusting in another cartridge. "Forward, you chieftain of the clan, MacGillie Callum! I will slay every wild animal in the Island of Jura before I have done with you."

The success of Mr. Brown was truly surprising; but it was not to be wondered at that no one else got a shot. His jubilant cries and his urging on of the dogs—in spite of the angry expostulations of Mr Weyland, and the plaintive remonstrances of the keeper—put up the birds at extraordinary distances while his luck in firing recklessly at them was marvellous. The more disgusted his companions were, the more wildly Mr. Brown laughed, until we wondered what demon out of Der Freischutz had transformed the ordinarily quiet and amiable Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh. At last he flung himself down on the heather, placed his gun beside him, and waved his cap over his head.

"How many have I killed, slain, mangled, and extirpated? A hundred brace, if I have touched a feather! And you say I can't shoot, you counter-jumpers, who can't touch a bird unless you are near enough to put salt on his tail. I tell you what I'll do with you, merely to give you a chance. I shall stop here and smoke a cigar for an hour or so, and you can come back this way. Donald, Dougal, Duncan, or Alexander MacTavish, you leave those hordes of slain here, and go on with the dogs."

When we returned that way, some two hours thereafter, Mr. Brown, M.P., was fast asleep on the hillside, his cap over his face, and his head surrounded by a halo of killed grouse, that were lying in picturesque groups on the heather. He awoke with an air of bewildered surprise, but assented eagerly to our proposal that—in view of the excessive and insufferable heat—we should give up shooting for the day, and return to the Kittiwake for luncheon. Very proudly did he march down the glen; and as we sat in the stern of the Kittiwake that afternoon, and talked of the day's performances, Mr. Brown, M.P., took a cigar from his mouth, and airily offered to shoot grouse, for a bet, against any man in or out of the Hebrides.

CHAPTER XII.

AMONG THE MOUNTAIN HARES.

“THIS,” said Mr. Brown, M. P., “is enjoyment.”

We had gone ashore after dinner, and wandered along the rough coast-road in the falling twilight. Mr Brown was now seated on a huge boulder of rock, out at a promontory that jutted into the sea, and, as he calmly smoked his cigar, he listened to the sound of the waves around him, as they plashed on the stony beach. In the cold green light that filled the sky the stars were not yet visible; but the darkness was sufficient to show us certain glittering orange points along the opposite shores of Islay, where the lights of Port-Ascaig burned yellow in the dusk. The air was filled with the odor of the seaweed. As the darkness deepened we heard the calling of the sea-birds far out at sea; and the islands of Colonsay and Oronsay, that had lain like masses of cloud along the horizon, now wholly disappeared. There was no sign of life around us but the green and red lights of the Kittiwake, that sent two quivering lines of color down on the moving plain.

“Here,” said Mr Brown, in an absent way, “we can think of something better than killing harmless deer and slaughtering frightened birds. We forget the stupid and boorish exhilaration of the chase, and seek the calm and pensive contemplation of the sea. Do you think that any man could live by the sea, and fail to be a poet? Look at it now—listen to the distant calling of the waves, as if they were holding some wild Walpurgis night out there in the darkness. If I had lived on the shores of Crinan, like Campbell, I, too, might have written something like that splendid sea-song which is the only national hymn worthy of the name that we have got; and who could dwell among these lonely islands without imagining such visionary stories and legends as that of the Maid of Colonsay? What is the beginning of it?—

On Jura's heath how sweetly swell
The murmurs of the mountain bee!

How softly mourns the writhèd shell
Of Jura's shore, its parent sea!

But softer floating o'er the deep,
The mermaid's sweet sea soothing lay,
That charmed the dancing waves to sleep
Before the bark of Colonsay!

Don't you think there is the sound of the sea in it—the melancholy and monotonous falling of waves on the shore? But we who have our duties elsewhere—we who are driven to dwell on Factory Bills, and Militia Bills, and Gas and Water Bills, and Bills for the repression of ruffianism at elections—we who are cooped up in the hottest weather in that hushed and gloomy chamber, with the lights in the roof making all our faces of the color of faded butter—what chance have we of walking by the shore, and having our brain filled with dreams, and constructing some wild adventure with a mermaid, or a banshee, or some such unholy and mystic creature?”

The Member for Slow struck a vesuvian on the rock, and Mr. Brown gave a violent start. Then he said in a peevish tone—

“Of course, you want suitable companions with you, even to enjoy a brief glimpse of the sea. There are some men who care for nothing but eating, drinking, and killing other animals—”

“Meaning me,” remarked the Member for Slow.

This excess of humility on the part of Mr. Weyland suddenly disarmed the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh. Mr. Brown protested that he had been misunderstood. He did not seek to condemn the sports of the field, in moderation, As for Weyland himself, he was one of the very pleasantest companions, said Mr. Brown, a man could meet; and how could we be sufficiently indebted to him for his hospitality?”

“All right, old boy,” said Weyland, “but you are indebted to Hulishtaveg, not to me; he has given you a couple of days' excellent deer-shooting; and the keeper told me that the district we shot over to-day is the best piece of grouse-shooting Maclean has got.”

“Grouse-shooting,” observed Mr. Brown, with the tone of a connoisseur, “is neither so noble nor so picturesque a pastime as the shooting of red-deer. When we were to-day pottering about the hillsides up there, I was longing to catch even a glimpse of the lofty and desolate region in which we shot the deer yesterday. But doubtless it was miles away; or perhaps a single chain of those splendid hills removed it, as it were, into another world."

At this moment we heard a voice calling out of the darkness, and, having answered the summons, there came down toward us the tall figure of Donald.

"I will bring you a message from Mester Maclean, and he wass sayin' if you would like to go and shoot sa hares sa morn's mornin'. We hef a good many hares where it will not frighten either sa deer or sa grouse, and he says you are ferry welcome."

Mr. Brown, M.P., turned round on his pinnacle of rock.

"Donald," he said, "you will inform Mr. Maclean that we do not know how to thank him for his kindness; that we accept his invitation with gratitude; and that we shall meet you at a reasonable and decent hour to-morrow morning—say nine o'clock—at any point to which you may bring the dogs."

"Sa tawgs?" said Donald, in a stupefied way, "what wass you wantin' tawgs for?"

"My good man," replied Mr. Brown, with gracious condescension. "Providence not having gifted us English people with the nose of a setter or pointer, how do you expect us to seek out hares on the side of a Highland hill?"

Here, however, Mr. Weyland interfered, and endeavored to save Mr. Brown's reputation for sanity by treating the whole matter as a joke. Donald was asked to meet us next morning; and then we returned to the yacht.

Next day we were again favored with clear and beautiful weather, and there was a slight breeze coming in from the sea, which promised to make the climbing of the hills less broiling work than it had proved the day before. Mr. Brown had sat up till twelve on the previous night to make an abundance of cartridges, so that his pockets, as well as his belt, were liberally provided. He had formed an idea that we should have a good deal of shooting.

"Not that I consider hare-shooting an exciting thing," he remarked, as we left the shore-road and began to climb up a rocky path leading by a small cottage. "Hare-shooting I look upon as the tamest of field sports. You probe up an unfortunate animal from a tuft of grass, it runs straight before you, and never dodges, and who but the merest tyro could miss it?"

"Did you ever shoot blue hares?" said Mr. Weyland.

"No, nor pink rhinoceroses," said Mr. Brown, contemptuously ; for he evidently did not believe in the existence of blue hares.

By the time, however, that we reached the foot of the hill where Donald and a boy, both armed with long saugh rods, were waiting for us, Mr. Weyland had delivered such a lecture on the habits and characteristics of the lepus variabilis that Mr. Brown was prepared to find it green as well as blue. Indeed, when he finally understood that he was about to engage in the pursuit of a wild mountain creature his face became more grave. Was this the hare, he asked, that turned white in the winter, and lived in the region of ptarmigan. Arctic bears and perpetual snow ?

We began to ascend. Our course, in the first instance, lay up the side of a little ravine, down which a brown stream was prattling lightly ; and then we got up on the first shoulder of the hill. Here a brace of black game got up, but Mr. Brown showed admirable steadiness, and allowed them to sail away unharmed to some distant place of safety. Donald and his assistant still walked on.

"Hadn't we better try this piece of swamp?" said my friend, who was apparently rather hot and considerably blown.

"It iss no use," said Donald carelessly. "Sa hares in sa goot days keep up sa hill."

He had scarcely spoken when Mr. Brown uttered a terrific shout. Some forty yards ahead of us a hare had got up from behind a tuft of rushes ; and just as we caught sight of her, Weyland had put up his gun. The next second the hare had rolled twice over on the spongy ground and lay there.

"It wass a goot shot," said Donald gravely ; "it wass as ferry goot a shot as I will have seen for many a tay."

Mr. Brown walked briskly up to the boy, who was now running back with the prize.

"That isn't a blue hare, any way," he remarked confidently.

"But it is," said Weyland, "and nothing else."

"Oh, very well," replied my friend ; "if you like to call a dark-gray hare a blue hare, you need stop at nothing. Outside the slang of sporting men, blue is blue, and gray is gray ; but if in shooting gray is blue, and blue is gray, why don't you talk of green deer and orange snipe ? If this is the wonderful prodigy we have come to shoot, I don't anticipate much difficulty. As far as I can make out, it goes on four legs just like an ordinary hare and indeed is so uncommonly like an ordinary hare that a charge of No. 6 shot won't find out the difference.'

Mr. Brown smiled complacently with the air of having said a good thing, and then we set to work to gain the second shoulder of the hill. Here some greater caution was observed, and, indeed, we had just put our heads over the crest of the ascent when Donald signalled to Mr. Brown to come near him. The Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh took his gun down from his shoulder, and, grasping it with both hands, crept forward, Donald pointed to a thick tuft of dried grass that stood by the edge of one of those long black drains that have now been cut through so many of the mountainous sheep pastures of Scotland. From our point of view nothing was visible behind the yellow tuft of grass, but, as Donald was evidently anxious to let Mr. Brown get a shot, we waited to see him advance. What was our astonishment to see our friend suddenly put up his gun to his shoulder and fire. Nothing had stirred. We saw Mr. Brown rush forward, and then, with a triumphant gesture, he held up some dark object in the air.

"Look here, Donald," said the Member for Slow, with perceptible irritation in his voice. "Why didn't you stop him? When a man is such a fool as to shoot a hare sitting in her form, why on earth didn't you stop him?"

"Cash pless me!" said Donald in a wondering way, "I tit not know he wass goin' to fire."

"This is rather too bad, you know, Brown," said Weyland, with ill concealed disgust, when the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh came back to us.

"What is too bad?" said Brown indignantly. "Shooting a hare when you get the opportunity? You think I ought to have let her run and then shot her! Admirable logic! What does the hare care for that few yards' scamper, and an extra minute of life? Giving her a chance for her life! Why, what a childish superstition that is, as if there were a bargain between you and the hare, or as if the hare appreciated your courtesy. Let me remind you my dear friend, that all these fantastic notions are of modern and spurious growth. Our ancestors shot how, when, and where they could, and none of them thought of setting birds into the air to have a chance of winging a dozen of 'em. No; they shot them fairly and completely on the ground, and ate them afterward. You, yourself, when you steal up to a stag, do you force it into the air before you fire at it? Clear your mind of cant, Weyland. For my part I put aside these ridiculous theories and superstitions—the sham metaphysics of the sporting parson!”

Here Mr. Brown took a drink, and we went on.

The noise of the shot had startled a flock of the pretty little Highland sheep, that had been quietly feeding at the further end of this plateau, and a stampede had taken place, the nimble little animals trotting lightly along the bare eminences and down rocky gullies at a singular speed. Now they stood at different points and looked back, looking very picturesque with their small black heads, their curled horns, and big, intelligent eyes. We traversed the whole extent of this plateau without finding anything (a small covey of grouse got up out of shot), and then we betook ourselves to still higher ground.

Here the ascent was very rugged; masses of gray rock, with an occasional white vein of quartz glimmering in it, stood out from the side of the hill, and seemed to bar all progress. But it was here our day's shooting properly began and in something less than half an hour we picked off three hares that were scuttling away among the rocks as we cautiously ascended. None of these had fallen to Mr. Brown's gun; indeed he was too busy climbing to think of firing; and when we reached the top of the rocks he proposed we should rest awhile, and have some brief snatch of luncheon, which a gillie carried. The five hares were unslung from the stick and laid on the heather; the sandwiches were brought forth, and Mr. Brown produced his flask.

It was excessively hot. The slight breeze from the sea had died down—there was not enough left to stir the slight column of blue smoke ascending from the bowl of Mr. Brown's meerschaum. The sun seemed to scorch the close grass and heather on the rounded shoulders of the hill, and the rocks seemed as if they would splinter in the fierce heat. In the silence that succeeded luncheon we could hear only the bleating of the sheep far below us, and the distant trickling of the burn. It was probable, indeed, that sleep would have overtaken the whole party had not Mr. Brown been seen to grasp his gun stealthily. We turned. The next moment we saw him level the weapon at a hare which had just then caught sight of us and was darting up toward the rocks above. Bang! went the first barrel; a cloud of smoke rose from a piece of rock some two yards behind the hare.

Bang ! went the second barrel, and Mr. Brown gazing eagerly through the smoke, found that he had actually killed his quarry. "Well shot!" called out Weyland; and then the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh laid down his gun quietly, and said, with a splendid affectation of indifference, "Boy go and fetch that hare,"

He took up his pipe again and smoked on peacefully.

"It was a remarkably good shot," said Mr. Weyland.

"Oh, passable," replied our friend.

"How did you catch sight of him in time?"

"I don't generally sleep in the middle of the day," said Mr. Brown, adding in a minute or two, "I am not ashamed to confess that I am rather pleased to have shot this hare. We have now two each; and I have learned that the speed of the mountain hare is not quite a synonym for lightning."

"You underrate your skill," said Weyford, good-naturedly "That hare just now was going at an uncommonly good pace."

"Oh, all you have to do is to aim well forward—well forward," remarked Mr. Brown seriously. "There is nothing I hate so much as to see a hare or a rabbit shot in the hind legs—it is so very unsportsmanlike. With a little practice, you know, I think I could pick up my old knack of quick shooting. Ah! you ought to have been with the shooting parties in the Black forest that I used to go down to from Heidelburgh in my student days. There you have to keep your wits about you, when you've got to tell between the bucks and the does as they go past you like lightening. By the way, did you ever hear 'Im Wald und auf der Haide'?"

The Member for Slow, said he had not; whereupon our friend promised to sing it for us that night. And he was as good as his word. When, after the day's shooting—we only got two more hares during the whole of the afternoon—we sat down to dinner, Mr. Brown described to Hulishtaveg, in the most vivacious manner, the picturesque shooting-parties of the Prince von Furstenberg, and then in the course of the evening he not only sung us "Im Wald und auf der Haide," but also, in tremulous and sentimental tones, the old and sad story of the "Zerbrochene Ringlein." Mr. Brown was now fairly in the land of poetry and romance. He forgot all about the Customs Clerks' grievances. He appealed to Mr. Maclean to say whether that song of the broken ring was not fit to move a whole nation to tears, and Hulishtaveg replied gravely.

"Oh, it iss a ferry goot song—a ferry goot song, whatever. And sa words o't will pe ferry like sa Gallic—oh, ferry like sa Gallic, mirover. And I trink your ferry goot health, Mester Prown, and hope you will often come again to sa Jura Hills.”

CHAPTER XIII.

MR. BROWN, M. P., AT A HIGHLAND WEDDING.

ONCE more the stately Kittiwake spread forth her white wings to the breeze, and like the seabird that she was, made out for the sea. Maclean of Hulishtaveg, stood on the beach, and waved his bonnet in adieu—the sunlight showing us his white hair and stalwart form defined against the dark shadow of a rock.

“Farewell brave son of the hills,” said Mr. Brown, M. P., holding on by the ratlines and talking in a mock-heroic tone, which had nevertheless something of tenderness and truth in it; “farewell, thou venerable and kindly patriarch, whose frame has the strength and the dignity of thy native mountains; whose hair is as white as the mist that hangs around them; whose nature is as warm and as genial as the sunshine that now falls over this blue sea. Think of him, Weyland, living in this lonely island, without a relative left him in the world, passing the long and dreary winters indoors by himself, having never mixed in the crowded cities of the south, and yet bearing himself towards his servants, toward his associates, and toward strangers with the courtesy, and grace, and dignity of a perfect gentleman. And I wish there were more such gentlemen as he among our aristocracy, and that our House of Lords could show on its benches a dozen men as good as old Hulishtaveg!”

“I wish you'd let the House of Lords alone,” said Mr. Weyland, sharply.

“I don't wonder you are anxious to shield them from criticism,” said the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh, with a splendid air of contempt—“the ridiculous old nincompoops. I suppose they're sitting out on their lawns just now, in easy chairs, wheezing asthmatically in the sunshine, listening to other people shooting in their fields, and feebly endeavoring to sip beef tea."

"I presume you are not troubled with many lords among your relatives, or you'd know more about'em," remarked the Member for Slow, with anger gathering in his eyes.

Mr. Brown laughed gayly.

"My name," he said, "is a right good old Saxon one. There were Browns in this country before ever a Norman thief set his foot on our shores, and there will be Browns in this country when the effigy of the last of the barons shall have been carted up to Madame Tussaud's, and the skeleton of the last duke placed in the British Museum among the Megatheria! Allay your wrath, Weyland. Brown is a good name. The first man who wore it earned it because he was, in actual point of fact, brown; but the first man who was called duke was probably an imbecile courtier no more fit to lead an army than to cook a beefsteak."

"It appears to me," remarked Mr. Weyland, slowly, "that you have had your head turned by the sight of the stag's horns that Maclean sent down. I don't mean to answer you according to your folly. The House of Lords is the most firmly fixed institution in the country; and I don't suppose the axis of the earth will be altered by the scraping of a mouse."

"'Gree, bairns, 'gree!" said the Glasgow bailie, "it is jist by ordinar to hear twa reasonable crayturs argy-bargying like that on a braw, fine mornin' when they micht as weel be lookin' about and enjoyin' theirsels. Hoose o' Loards! Bless me—what's the Hoose o' Loards to a man that's up in the Soond o' Jura! On a day like this, I wauldna fash my thoomb for twenty Hooses of Loards!"

No living man had ever before heard the bailie make so long a speech. He instantly relapsed into silence, and having fixed on his spectacles, betook himself to his newspaper. Weyland busied himself with the tiller, and kept his eye directed toward the small harbor of Port-Ascaig, for which we were bound. The Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh lighted a cigar, went up to the bow, and proceeded lazily to scan the prospect before him—the far stretch of white sea away to the south, where Gigha (pronounced Yeea) and Cantire lay blue in the haze. And then the Kittiwake glided into the small bay, the gig was lowered, and in a few minutes we were on the shores of Islay. The bailie had remained behind. He was opposed to violent exercise, and so, instead of joining us in a ride across the island to meet the Kittiwake in Loch-indaal, he preferred to make the full circuit with the yacht.

It was with some difficulty that we procured the three animals we required to take us across, and there was even more trouble about getting the necessary harness. In our quest we were much helped by the ferryman who runs a small boat between Port-Ascaig and Jura. At last the steeds were forthcoming; and very sorry-looking creatures they were—rough, rawboned brutes, that looked melancholy for want of the familiar cart-shafts, and yet allowed us to mount with a docile resignation that was almost pathetic. Indeed, what with Weyland's yachting costume of blue and brass buttons, and Mr. Brown's suit of light gray tartan, completed with a Glengarry cap and a cigar, it is to be feared that our procession—as we left the small and thoroughly astonished village—was more remarkable for variety and picturesqueness than for any deference to the customs of civilized life; and Mr. Brown, as he gently entreated his charger to ascend the hill lying behind Port-Ascaig, could not forbear speculating on the reception which would have been accorded to us in Hyde-park on some pleasant morning in July. But the quiet and simple Highland folk about saw nothing peculiar in our appearance; and the ferryman aforesaid, on our leaving, hinted that we were probably going over to the marriage at Bridge-end.

“What marriage?” said Mr. Brown.

“Oh, it will pe shist sa marriage o' John MacDougal, sa tailor frae Greenock, wi' sa tochter o' Sligan-dubh. Sey are koin'to be married at sa inn.”

“Why, the very inn we proposed to stay at,” remarked Mr. Brown in alarm; “And I suppose it will be filled with the whole clan MacDougal, including a dozen pipers.”

We did not desist from our project, however; and in course of time we found ourselves up amid the lonely flats of Islay, with the air around us filled with the resinous odor of the sweet gale, the most fragrant of all the marsh plants. The three horses we had borrowed were not subjected to a severe pace; on the contrary, they were allowed to walk so leisurely for the most part of the journey that we found it more convenient and more pleasant to descend and lead them. By this time the two members of Parliament had made up the brief quarrel of the morning; and Mr. Brown was engaged in detailing to his friend such of the grievances of the Customs clerks as he had already been made familiar with. His study of the documents had been postponed by unavoidable causes; but he had nevertheless a vague notion of the subject, and perhaps satisfied his conscience by talking of what he knew. There was not much else to attract attention. The interior of Islay is far from being as picturesque as Jura. It consists chiefly of undulating moorland, here and there broken up by the bed of a stream, and showing an occasional cottage or farmhouse, the fields surrounding which stretch out into the black and unclaimed morass. The road was most desolate. Scarcely a human being was to be seen for miles. But at last we beheld a wondrous sight in this solitude—a long string of people, in gay dresses, coming up the road in pairs, and preceded by two pipers. And while they were yet distant we heard the strange, wild music of the pipes, that had something in its peculiar wail and skirl that seemed appropriate to this savage wilderness. As we drew nearer the music resolved itself into an air, and we knew that this was the wedding-party, for the pipes were playing no pibroch of Locheil, but the familiar Lowland tune of "Woed and married and a'." After the pipers came the bridegroom and bride, the former a tall young fellow, whose pale face and slight figure contrasted strongly with the browned, bearded, and thickset men who followed in the procession. The bride was a fresh and healthy-looking lass, with rosy cheeks, dark hair, and dark blue eyes, who blushed prodigiously at the jokes which were being shouted by the company. Immediately behind the wedded pair came the best-man, arm-in-arm with the chief bridemaid, and then followed the string of friends and relatives, the old people winding up the procession.

As we got near them they turned into a house that stood a short distance from the wayside: but the best-man remained for a second or two until we came up, and insisted on our drinking our good health of the young couple. In answer to Mr. Brown's inquiries he explained that this was his house; that they were going to remain there for an hour or two before going on to the bridegroom's father's farm; that the marriage had taken place down at Bridge-end Inn, and that the tall tailor was a great favorite, for he had come a fortnight in advance of the marriage, and gone round to the houses of his friends, and presented them each with a day's sewing. The best-man pointed to his own coat and waistcoat—garments composed of thick and rough homes-spun cloth—as an evidence of MacDougal's skill; and added that, in return, he thought the least he could do was to send on three gallons of the best Lagavulin whisky to MacDougal's father's farm.

“There will pe sa great doin's there this nicht,” he said. “There will pe forty or fifty folk there, and there is two fiddlers comin' over frae Bowmore, besides sa twa pipers. It will pe a ferry goot weddin' whatever; and sa minister—he took a glass o' whusky wi' us, and said that Bella was as braw a lass as he had married for years and years together. Wass you koin to Bridge-end or Bowmore?”

“We are going to Bridge-end,” replied Mr. Brown, in a bland manner, “but we are not in any hurry; and if you would be kind enough to let us join your party for a short time, I should be delighted to send down to Bridge-end for another gallon of Lagavulin.”

The small blue eyes in the sunburned face were opened to their fullest extent.

“What wass you sayin'? More whusky? Cash pless me, our whusky is ferry goot—oh, ferry goot whusky! What wass you wantin' to send to Bridge-end for?—but come in to sa hoose—come in to sa hoose—and you will find it ferry goot whusky whatever.”

We abandoned our steeds to the care of an urchin; but, instead of going into the house, went up into the yard whither nearly all the party had preceded us. Here two “four-some reels” were being danced with immense vigor, the piper standing firm and erect, blowing lustily, and tapping on the ground with his foot in time with the wild music. And when this performer—an old man, with long gray hair, who was the only person present wearing the kilt—was marched up to the chair on which a cask of Lagavulin was placed, his post was occupied by one of the guests, who had found an old violin somewhere. Why was it that all the young folk sprung up when he began to play? Mr. Brown, M. P., snapping his fingers in time to the music, and laughing prodigiously, and crying, “Hey!” occasionally, as some strapping young fellow gave a grand pirouette in the air, was suddenly startled by the departure of the violin into a series of discordant shrieks. Lo! the reel stopped. Each of the bearded dancers caught his partner, and, after a little rough by-play, succeeded in imprinting a kiss on her rosy and blushing cheek. And then the violin returned to its more decorous duties: the reel was recommenced; and the couples danced on until they were tired, and until the men were ready for another dram.

Mr. Brown, M. P., was subsequently introduced to the bride; but, as her stock of English, was very limited, her share in the conversation chiefly consisted of blushing. The old people were very pleased to have strangers grace the ceremony; but here again there were obstacles, for all the English the bride's mother knew was, "Coot tay, sir, coot tay!" It was, however, pointed out to the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh that he was delaying the procession, which had yet about a dozen miles of rough moorland and bog to get over; and so, as we got on our horses again out came the two pipers and the fiddler—all playing at once—the company once more divided itself into pairs, and away they went along the road, with many a laugh and a joke. The best-man, who was certainly excited, shook hands with us in a most affectionate manner on parting; and indeed it seemed probable that he would shed tears.

When we got down to Bridge-end Inn we found that the excitement caused by the marriage had not subsided there. Some friends from the northern side of the island, who could not go all the way, had remained in the inn, and they, too had a piper. The marriage had been solemnized in the public room of the place—chairs and tables having been cleared out; and in this empty room the remaining visitors were now holding high jinks—dancing, drinking, and joking, while in the corner an old man was singing, to a select audience, in a shrill, quavering key, some song which was probably of his own composition. Our host informed us that they would soon start on their homeward journey, piper and all, and so, having arranged about getting the three chargers returned to Port-Ascaig, we set off for an afternoon stroll.

Issuing from the trees round Bridge-end we came in sight of the broad waters of Loch-Indaal (pronounced Lock-Indawl, the accent on the last syllable), with the small town of Bowmore sending up a faint cloud of blue smoke in the evening sky. There was a stiff breeze blowing up from the west, and a small sailing-boat—probably a ferry between Bowmore and the other side of the loch—was dipping well to the waves and scattering the white foam from her bows. Of course, there were as yet no tidings of the Kittiwake; and we could only imagine her making head against the wind away on the northern side of the island, with our friend the Glasgow bailie looking out on the open waters of the Atlantic or gazing down into the south to find on the misty horizon the pale blue line of the Irish coast.

CHAPTER XIV.

HOMeward BOUND.

WHILE the Kittiwake lay in Loch Indaal a batch of letters arrived ; and among them was one which seemed to cause Mr. Brown, M.P., some concern. By the aid of a telescope, he had been endeavoring to make out the Irish coast ; but now he came aft, laid down the glass, and informed us gravely that Mr. —— had sent him an invitation to go shooting in Berkshire. Now this Mr. —— is a Cabinet Minister, and there were many reasons, said Mr. Brown, why the invitation should be at once accepted.

“ I should have thought Cabinet Ministers had had enough of Berkshire,” said the Member for Slow, with a sneer. “ Why doesn't he ask you to go shooting in Hampshire ? But, if you must go, don't be in a hurry. I will take you back to Greenock, and there you can get the London train. Besides, you know you have to call in at Arran for your kilt.”

“ True,” said Mr Brown, thoughtfully. “ And there is another reason why a day or two's delay might be advisable. Somehow or other I have never been able to study those papers I brought away with me, you know, referring to the grievances of the Customs clerks. Here is a capital opportunity. A day or two devoted to them will be time well spent ; for then I shall go up to Berkshire with the subject fresh in my mind, and be able to lay it before —— . Indeed, I am very glad that I have so far postponed the consideration of those documents ; but now there must be no further delay.”

All this was satisfactory. The Kittiwake spread out her white sails, Weyland took up his post at the tiller, and very soon she was cutting through the blue plains of Loch Indaal, with a dash of curling foam at her bows, a gurgling of waters along her bulwarks, and a line of hissing white in her wake. As we got out into the open sea, we caught sight of the Rathlin Isles lying like a faint thread of purple on the southern horizon. Rounding the Mull of Islay, we got into rather a heavy sea; and not unfrequently one of the long-rolling Atlantic waves would rush up to the Kittiwake, take her at a disadvantage, and send a deluge of water over her decks. There was a brisk breeze, too, and when some less formidable wave hit the side of the yacht and rose towering into the air, the wind tossed the spray all over us, until our waterproofs gleamed wet in the sunshine.

“Is she not rather a small boat to be out in the open sea?” said Mr. Brown, timidly, looking away down toward the North Channel and the stormy Mull of Cantire.

“Why this is nothing,” said the Member for Slow, shaking the salt water from his beard, “this is nothing to what you’ll get going round the Mull. If you like we can run in for Port Ellen and take her up through the Crinan to-morrow; but with this wind we’ll get clean away round to Arran this afternoon, and there is no more danger than if you were sitting in a hansom in Palace-yard.”

“Oh, I’m not afraid,” said the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh, standing erect, but grasping the twisted steel shrouds with a firm hand. “Don’t imagine I’m afraid. Personally, I like this—I enjoy it—it stirs your blood and sets your spirits on fire—but—but it was the safety of the boat I was thinking of.”

“Oh, the yacht will take care of herself,” said Mr Weyland, good-naturedly. “In this sort of weather a sea swallow is as safe as an albatross.”

Certainly, the Kittiwake behaved very well, and as we got further to the south, a greater strain was put on her seafaring qualities. We were now fully exposed to the long Atlantic swells, and each time the clean little vessel went shivering down into the trough of wave, the next great green mountain seemed looming over her, as if about to break and engulf her. How lightly she rose, with the grace of a sea bird, to the summit of these mighty waves—how she seemed to shake the white foam back from her bows—and how she sped southward—apparently the only living thing on this great waste of waters—cannot be described. Weyland spoke of her affectionately, as of a companion who had gone with him on many a quest, and never failed. He laughed, and talked, and joked at the pitch of his voice; while his face, grown red with the beating of the spray and gleaming with the wet, burned in the sunlight. A finer day for such an excursion could scarcely have been wished for. Overhead, the sky was a plain of deep, pure blue ; and not a cloud was visible, except some white patches of mist that hung about the mountains of Jura far up in the north. Down in the south the outline of the Irish coast remained still indistinct ; but the Mull of Cantire was gradually becoming more clear, and we could see a white spurt of foam occasionally springing up the face of the precipitous rocks. All around us the hurrying plain of waves showed a thousand colors, as the sunlight, and the green color of the sea, and the blue reflection of the sky struggled for mastery, and gleamed here and there on the innumerable angles of the water. In the far distance, however, the reflection of the sky prevailed ; and around the shores of Cantire the sea was of a dark, intense and troubled blue.

It was not until we got down to the Mull that Mr. Brown, M. P., succumbed, and went below. There was some excuse for him. Here the regular swell of the Atlantic was broken up by a series of currents—they say that five tides meet just south of that wild promontory—and the result was an irregular, chopping sea, that knocked the Kittiwake about as if she were a cork. We saw no more of the member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh. He missed the sight of that strange wall of fissured rock, up which spouts of foam were leaping to a height of sixty or eighty feet as the heavy waves dashed in on the iron-bound coast. But as we got past the Sanda lighthouse the sea was less rough ; and by the time we had got round Pladda, and into the calmer waters to leeward of the Kildonan Rocks, the Kittiwake had recovered her equanimity, and her decks were becoming dry.

Then Mr. Brown, M P., appeared. His face was very white ; but he endeavored to assume a cheerful look.

“ Yes,” said he, “ I have made some progress with those Customs papers now. It is astonishing what you can do in a short space of time, when you put your mind to it.”

“ I am glad the yacht did not pitch so as to interfere with your study,” remarked Mr. Weyland, gravely.

“ Well,” said Mr. Brown, with a candid air, “ it was rather rough, wasn't it ? But I'm not such a bad sailor, you know.”

Here he began to whistle “ A Life on the Ocean Wave ;” and by and by, while the color was slowly returning to his face, we ran up by the coast of Arran, getting a glimpse of the smooth waters and string of cottages of Whiting Bay, the round shoulders of the Holy Island, and the not very picturesque houses of Lamlash, until we finally rounded Clachland Point, and stood in toward Brodick Bay, anchoring not far from the jetty used by the ferryboats.

We landed in the gig, and made our way up to the hotel, where a large parcel was found waiting for Mr. Brown, M. P. He blushed slightly on being informed of the fact; Mr. Weyland laughed. The fact was that some days before Weyland had persuaded our friend to order a suit of kilts from a tailor in Glasgow, as a memento of his Highland tour. Mr. Brown was shy at first; but it was pointed out to him that at a fancy ball, or at one of the Scotch celebrations in London, his picturesque costume would stand him in good stead. At length he was won over; and the tailor was directed to send the bundle down to Brodick, where the Kittiwake was to call.

For a long time Mr. Brown was doubtful about that kilt. The fact was we had not seen, in all our wanderings over Highlands and Lowlands, a single Scotchman wear the traditional garb of his country, except here and there a gamekeeper and a few English tourists. But at last, the costume being ready to his hand, and Brodick being a small place in which to try the experiment, he at length retired to a dressing-room, and we lost sight of him.

When Mr. Brown, M. P., came downstairs again, our first impulse was certainly not to laugh at him. There was a mute and sensitive appeal in his eyes. Weyland spoke of the costume approvingly and in a light manner; and then hinted that Mr. Brown might accompany us down to a little wooden erection near the jetty, where we proposed to purchase some photographs. Our friend glanced rather nervously out into the open air, as little boys do when they are about to be carried down for their first dip in the sea. Then a ghastly and painful smile appeared on his face for a moment, and he said, "All right."

We went out. Mr. Brown's costume, in the tartan of the Gordons, was resplendent, and the silver mountings and flashing jewels with which it was set shone in the evening light. Unhappily, however, the most conspicuous part of him was that which the kilt left uncovered, and there Mr. Brown seemed to rival the snowy whiteness of Andromeda, as she stood chained on the rock over the blue sea. Once or twice we caught him glancing apprehensively down, and a shiver occasionally passed through his frame as the wind blew up from the bay. However, no one spoke of his dress, and he in a somewhat loud tone of voice began to say,—

“What do you think, Weyland, I ought to do with that solan goose? I know a family of very nice young ladies at Laurie Park, Sydenham, and I should like to send them something from Scotland. Would the stuffed solan do? I hate sending game, which is in effect a commonplace and ridiculous custom, filling people’s larders for nothing, and cheating the poulterer out of his legitimate gains. I think I shall send the deer’s horns home to my own house, and the stuffed solan down to Sydenham.”

There were few loiterers about the small quay. Their eyes were apparently attracted toward Mr. Brown. He paid no attention. On the contrary he began to hum a French song—something about “Mire dans mes yeux tes yeux, ma belle brunette”—and then we reached the photographer’s shop or hut, into which we escaped from the gaze of the vulgar.

There was a very charming young lady of about thirteen selling those sixpenny treasures of art. Mr. Brown had entered the place with something of a swagger, but now he seemed anxious to get either of his companions to stand in front of him. He even seemed to crouch down a little bit whenever the soft eyes of this amiable young person were turned toward him. His face wore an uncomfortable look. He bought things recklessly. He answered at haphazard, and in rather a snappish tone. At last, when we got out, he said, in a voice of suppressed rage :

“Why did the fool make those confounded things so short !”

“They are quite as long as usual,” said Weyland, “only you’re not accustomed to them.”

He had scarcely uttered the words when a sudden commotion occurred. A keeper had come down to the jetty with a brace of setters in leash, and a big black retriever, with rather wolfish eyes. No sooner did the black dog behold Mr. Brown and the unusual spectacle of his milk-white calves, than he rushed furiously at him. Mr. Brown uttered a sharp low cry, and stumbled backward into the photographer’s shop. The dog followed him, closed up on him, and stood with his fore feet stuck out, barking wildly, and apparently about to spring at the members which had offended him. An exciting scene now followed. The young lady endeavored to push back the dog with an umbrella. Mr. Brown, with a face grown white, tried to get behind the small counter, and failed. Weyland aimed a kick at the brute, and missed. The keeper tried to collar him, without avail; and it was not until a whole posse comitatus of boatmen, servants, and loungers had hunted the dog off and tied him up that our pale and alarmed friend ventured forth. We got him up to the hotel, where he took a little brandy, and then tried to put a brave face on the matter.

"Those horrid curs!" he exclaimed; "I wonder if that brute belongs to the Duke of Hamilton. If so I should be inclined to write to him, and I am sure the Duke would order the keeper to shoot the dog."

"You have had rather an adventure with your kilt," said the Member for Slow in a kind way.

"I shan't take it off for that," said Mr. Brown, courageously.

It was now close upon dinner time, and we walked into the large room. One or two people were already there, and among them were a lady and her two daughters, whom Weyland knew. He took occasion to introduce his friends; and Mr. Brown found himself constrained to bring forward a chair and sit down in front of the mamma. Presently we observed that there was a crimson hue over his forehead, and he spoke in a nervous fashion. We could see him twitching at his kilt occasionally, and edging his chair round. The color in his face deepened; his embarrassment grew painfully obvious. At length he rose to his feet, and said, in almost an excited way—

"Will you excuse me, Madam? I think I have forgotten my—my—my handkerchief."

With that he got out of the room; and in about a quarter of an hour, when we were all at dinner, he returned, in the ordinary attire of a sane person. But rage fierce, and uncontrollable still dwelt in his eyes.

"Think of the infamous ruffian," he said, in a vicious whisper, "making a costume like that, and we supposed to be living in civilized society! I declare I'll give them to the first crossing sweeper I meet at Notting hill, and make him wear them to bring eternal disgrace on garments that are not fit for a savage. The Caledonian Ball? Bah, I suppose the gentlemen who go to that interesting ceremony complain of the dresses worn by ballet girls. They ought to be ashamed of themselves."

"Which?" said Weyland, "the gentlemen or the ballet girls?"

“You,” replied Mr. Brown, “for having inveigled me into making an ass of myself. But you don’t catch me doing it again; no, never, if I lived in the desert of Sahara, without a human being to be found within a thousand miles of me. It is not, however, the ridicule of the vulgar that I fear; it is the censure of your own mind when you have been led to sacrifice your self-respect.”

Mr. Brown’s vehemence, however, died down; and after dinner when we were peacefully smoking a cigar, he even managed to laugh over the adventure with the dog. And then he told us in a confidential mood of the manner in which he meant to appeal to the Cabinet Minister about the grievances of the Customs clerks, and of the great deeds he expected to do among the partridges after his experiences in the North.

CHAPTER XV.

THE LAST TURN.

MR. BROWN had now to decide whether he would remain in Arran next day, and get up to Greenock on the following morning, or whether he would finish up his Highland wanderings by a run through the Kyles of Bute. He wisely chose the latter alternative. Like children on a garden swing, he wanted “a good one for the last;” and Weyland had quite stimulated his curiosity by his talk of the fairy loveliness of the Kyles.

“Besides,” said Mr. Brown, “during the quiet sail up there, I shall be able to give an hour or two to those papers. I have little time left now and must economize it.”

Accordingly, on a beautiful and bright forenoon, we bade farewell to Brodick Bay, and stood out into the broad estuary of the Clyde, which is here as spacious and as clear as an inland sea. We had a magnificent view of the Arran mountains as we got out some little distance from the shore—their splendid peaks just touched here and there with a flake of white cloud, while a flood of sunlight poured down into the great valleys of Glen Rosa and Glen Sannox, and lay drowily on the fir-woods surrounding Brodick Castle. We passed the steamer coming over from Ardrossan; and Mr. Brown, standing at the bow, waved his handkerchief to the passengers—a salute which was returned.

It was indeed a pleasant morning. There was just enough westerly wind to fill our sails and ruffle the blue bosom of the deep; and the Kittiwake, scarcely lying over, cut lightly through the water. The further we got north, the more lovely seemed the prospect that lay all around us. Over there on the right were the smooth hills and long-stretching woods of Ayrshire, with the towns of Troon, Irvine, and Ardrossan glimmering through a faint haze of smoke; further up the two Cumbraes seemed to be almost close inshore; right ahead of us were the lonely shores and green undulations of the Island of Bute; and away on our left, the Sound of Bute stretched up toward the Cowal coast and the broad mouth of Loch Fyne.

Nowhere in all our wanderings had we seen such numbers and varieties of sea-birds; and Mr. Brown's attention was wholly given up to watching for long strings of wild duck, and clouds of tern, and clusters of guillemots floating on the waves. Great was his anxiety, too, to discover whether each white gull that appeared in the distance was not a solan; and, in point of fact, he was gratified by the sight of at least half a dozen of those birds—hovering singly, for the most part, over the smooth waters that lay under the shadow of the shores of Cantire. At last, so many and so various were the strange animals that kept flying about and tantalizing him, that he went below and fetched up Weyland's gun.

“I thought you had gone down for the Customs clerks' papers,” remarked the Member for Slow, gravely.

“Bother the Customs clerks' papers!” said Mr. Brown; and then he added in rather a vexed tone, “why can't you allow a man to have a moment's relaxation? No sooner does one begin to feel amused and prone to enjoy the passing moments without thinking, than you must thrust forward your admonitions about work. I don't think it's friendly. I don't see that you do so much work yourself.”

Weyland looked surprised.

“Why,” said he, “I never mentioned the matter before, and you have done nothing ever since you have been on board but talk of your confounded Customs clerks, and what you meant to do with them. You needn't get into a temper simply because you have been indolent.”

“Indolent!” said the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh, laughing bitterly. “Indolent! When I escaped from the fag end of a laborious session to recruit my health, which had been broken by late hours and close attention to parliamentary business, there was not much call for me to attack new work. But I did it voluntarily. Of my own free will I undertook this task. Of my own free will I have devoted my leisure to the study of those papers——”

“When?” said Mr. Weyland.

“When you were asleep, as you generally are,” was the retort.

At this point both Members of Parliament, catching each other's eye, burst out laughing; and the Scotch bailie, who had not spoken a word all the morning, joined in.

“To hear ye talk,” said our stout friend, “ane would think ye had nae mair minners than a when school-laddies. But I'm thinking ye have learned a' that in Paurliament. Short o' downright sweerin', the language you sometimes use on both sides o' the House is only fit for carters.”

“But the Conservative side at least preserves the show of courtesy,” remarked Weyland.

“The Liberal side,” retorted Mr. Brown, “having truth for its banner, can afford to speak fearlessly, and express its opinions about its opponents.”

With that the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh departed to the bow of the Kittiwake, with Weyland's breech-loader in his hand, and the grievances of the Customs clerks were once more relegated to the unknown future.

We were now in Inchmarnoch Water, and before us appeared the entrance into the magic wonders of the Kyles. A soft summer haze lay over the wooded hills and rocks, and the breeze was insensibly fading off; so that to leeward of Ardlamont Point the sea was still and smooth. It did not seem probable that we should get sufficient wind to carry us up to Tighnabruich; but we were still creeping along, and in course of time we were fairly up to Ardlamont Point, and into the Kyles.

Even as the discovery of America was announced by the firing of a cannon from the vessel of Fernandez Ponto, so our entrance into the Kyles of Bute was signalized by the report of Mr. Brown's breach-loader. We looked up toward the bow, and beheld our friend gesticulating wildly to the sailors, while some distance ahead a small object was floating on the water. The yacht was run close up to it, and then one of the sailors dextrously fished up the dead bird from the waves. It was a tern; and as Mr. Brown came aft in triumph, to show us the beautiful gray and speckled plumage and the curved, swallow-like wings, Weyland said—

“What a shame to kill one of those birds! It is mere wanton slaughter.”

“I don’t see it in that light,” remarked Mr. Brown coolly. “I am going down partridge-shooting. I wished to try the distance you must fire in front of a bird going at a great speed, and so I fired at this tern as he was going past like lightning. You see the result. It was a test—the tern being nearly of the same size as the partridge.”

“Is it? I suppose you mean to fire at cheepers or anything, and have——, Cabinet Minister as he is, swearing at you like a trooper.”

“I am not in the habit of making myself ridiculous when out shooting,” said Mr. Brown, with some dignity.

But this incident of the tern seemed to have drawn our friend’s attention in a new direction. He kept fidgeting about with the gun. He lamented that there would not now be time for his forming that collection of sea-birds he had once spoken of. He spoke of nothing but powder and lead, and wads and charges, until, finally, he said to Weyland, in an appealing voice,—

“I say, Weyland, couldn’t we have some shooting somewhere this afternoon?”

“Well, no,” said the Member for Slow; “not unless you like to go out in the evening to pot those divers, and that is not a very exciting form of amusement.”

“Oh, I think it is,” said Mr. Brown, eagerly. “Fancy the romance of it—the calm of the evening—the lovely scenery—the anxiety of the chase: by all means let us go out.”

Not a word about the Customs clerks. We slowly sailed up into the Kyles: a slight breeze just sufficed to carry us onward; and as we got up to Kames, all the loveliness of the place spread out before us. For the moment Mr. Brown was drawn from watching the sea-birds to contemplating that beautiful picture—the winding channel of blue water, the craggy hills, the deep umbrageous woods coming down to the very margin of the sea, the occasional white cottage gleaming above the shingly beach, and here and there a yacht coming out with all her sails set from the recesses of some secret bay. So still the place was, too, in the afternoon-sunlight ! We could hear nothing but the ripple of the water along the side of the Kittiwake, and the calling of the wild birds. When at last we came to an anchorage at Tighnabruich, and landed, and walked up to the inn there, Mr. Brown declared he had seen no lovelier scenery anywhere in the world.

But these pleasant surroundings and after-luncheon laziness of the afternoon did not wean him from his fell purpose. About six o'clock that night you might have seen us get into a little open sailing-boat, which had a heap of big stones lying along the bottom by way of ballast.

The owner and skipper of the craft was a sort of half boatman, half fisherman—an old weatherbeaten man, with a Scotch bonnet and garments patched and mended in many places. He was silent and even morose, and went about his work as though we had “requirit” his services, instead of having offered him a very handsome reward for the use of his boat.

However, Mr. Brown, M. P., took no heed of these things, nor did he pay any attention to Mr. Weyland's protestations against the unsportsmanlike errand on which we were bent. It was his last evening in the Highlands. Perhaps he might never again have a chance of shooting at those wild creatures of the deep which had woven a spell of fascination over him. He even forgot the brief and emphatic speech he had made in the House on the destruction of the wild-birds along our coast, when the Bill to prevent that was brought in.

How lovely the Kyles looked now, with the red colors of the sunset shining over the sea and the hills, and catching the sides of the mountains up by Loch Striven ! Far down in the south, too, the great plain lay still and silent, with here and there the sail of a fishing-smack glowing like a speck of crimson flame over the darkened surface of the waters. We lay in the stern of the small boat, and smoked our pipes, as she slowly got out to sea before a light breeze coming off the hills. Mr. Brown was up at the bow, his back against the mast, and his position partially concealed by the jib in front of him. He alone had brought a gun with him. Once or twice we saw him put it up to his shoulder ; and then again he would drop it with some low-muttered exclamation.

There were birds about somewhere. We could hear them calling. Now and again a whirr of wings was audible in the distance ; but none of the “dookers” came our way. At last, however, we saw the boatman touch Mr. Brown's arm, and point out something floating on the waves, or rather ripples, of the sea. There were two black specks visible on that purple plain, and we could see the boat's prow slowly wearing round toward them. The more near we got, the more clearly we saw the two birds—obviously "dookers," with their shining black and white plumage and curved beak. They were paddling about, in open disregard of us, and sometimes stretching themselves up to flutter their wings. When the boat was certainly not more than fifteen yards from them, off went both of Mr. Brown's barrels with a noise which was echoed all along the solitary shores of the Kyles.

"What a beastly shame!" said Weyland.

"Run the boat to," shouted Mr. Brown to the man, "run her up: turn her head! I know I killed them—I am sure I killed them—I'll swear they're killed!"

The old brown-faced man did not take the least notice of Mr. Brown's excitement.

"They were doon before the shot reached them," he said, moodily.

Whether the birds had "ducked the shot," or whether Mr. Brown had blown them into nothingness, we saw no further traces of them; and so once more our friend resumed his post, and we drifted further down. A very few minutes sufficed to discover to the anxious eyes at the bow another dark object on the water; and this time, just as the bird was fluttering its wings, we again heard a loud bang! and the unfortunate animal turned over on the water, and lay there. Weyland ran the boat close to the prize, and Mr. Brown, leaning over the side, made a dash at the bird and secured it. It is true, that at the same moment he had plunged his arm up to the elbow in the sea; but that did not damp the triumph with which he brought forward his quarry for our inspection. The bright eyes of the diver were still unglazed, and its smooth and clean plumage was dripping with the seawater.

"What is the use of killing those unfortunate animals?" said Mr. Weyland once more.

"Practice," observed the Member for Bourton-in-the-Marsh. "It is a deal more difficult to hit those birds than you imagine, when you have to steady yourself against the heaving of the boat, and at the same time watch the moment they are likely to come to the top of the wave."

“And is that good practice for shooting in Berkshire?” inquired the Member for Slow.

“If you don't like it, we can land you,” returned Mr. Brown.

“On the contrary,” said Weyland, “I enjoy myself where I am, amazingly, especially when I have the pleasure of your society and amiable conversation. I was only thinking how those birds liked it.”

“There are plenty of 'em,” said Mr. Brown, with a callous indifference which showed the brutalizing effect of a breech-loader.

And there were plenty of them. A few minutes thereafter, we steered right into a cluster of “dookers,” and here Mr. Brown fired right and left, slipping in cartridges and letting them off so long as there was a bird visible. Out of the lot he got two—at least, we could only find two, for in the curious metallic glare now falling over the sea it was difficult to distinguish objects.

“Are you satisfied with your aimless slaughter now?” asked Weyland.

“I don't consider it aimless slaughter,” retorted Mr. Brown, “when I mean to eat the birds.”

“Eat them!”

“Yes, why not?”

“You'll have a taste of herring in your mouth for a month.”

“The flavor of herring is not disagreeable in herring; why should it be in a bird? All you have to do is to imagine you are eating herring.”

“Your philosophy won't prevent your becoming sick.”

“We shall see,” replied Mr. Brown.

It was now resolved that we should make for Tighnabruich once more, lest the wind should fail us; and the chances were, besides, that Mr. Brown would have some more shooting on the way. But even he was weaned away from his watch by the extraordinary appearances now around us. The sun had gone down: but there was still a glow of red and yellow in the west. The hills above Tighnabruich were a dark, intense purple, that heightened the wild clear glare of the sky above. But the most peculiar sight of all was the singular radiance that was over the water—a glow of strange greenish yellow that broke into a thousand shapes as the waves rolled on. In the dusk the metallic glare of the sea was almost painful to the eyes; and we were glad to turn from it to the pure colors above, where a pale blue was shaded with pink, where the eastern sky caught the reflection of the sunset. The hills about the Kyles grew more and more dark. The sickle of the moon rose in the south, but her radiance was as yet not strong enough to touch the waves. When we finally got back to Tighnabruich, there were stars faintly visible in the sky, and a cold night-wind coming down from the solitudes of the hills.

"To-morrow," said Mr. Brown, "I go south. If I have in the excitement of the chase, offended you at any moment, Weyland, I am sorry for it. I leave Scotland, and all those magnificent scenes we have visited, with a deep and profound regret; and I shall often think of the splendid days we had together in the Kittiwake. But, you see, business calls me away—the hard and stern duties of the world. Do you think now I shall be able to study those Customs documents in the train, as I go up to London, to-morrow?"

"I don't know," said Weyland. "If I were you I should leave them over until I got to Berkshire."

"I think I must," said Mr. Brown, thoughtfully. "There is nothing that more clearly distinguishes the prudent man than the faculty of being able to sketch out and apportion his time so as to keep work and play in their proper and relative positions."

"SOHMER"

GRAND, SQUARE AND UPRIGHT PIANOS.

The demands now made by an educated musical public are so exacting, that very few piano-forte manufacturers can produce instruments that will stand the test which merit requires.

SOHMER & Co., as manufacturers, rank among this chosen few, who are acknowledged to be makers of standard instruments. In these days when many manufacturers urge the low price of their wares, rather than their superior quality, as an inducement to purchase, it may not be amiss to suggest that, in a piano, quality and price are too inseparably joined, to expect the one without the other.

Every piano ought to be judged as to the quality of its tone, its touch, and its workmanship; if any one of these is wanting in excellence, however good the others may be, the instrument will be imperfect. It is the combination of all these qualities in the highest degree that constitutes the perfect piano, and it is such a combination, as has given the SOHMER its honorable position with the trade and public.

WOMAN'S PLACE TO-DAY.

Four lectures in reply to the Lenten lectures on "Woman," by the Rev. Morgan Dix, D.D., of Trinity Church, New York.

By Lillie Devereux Blake.

No. 104, LOVELL'S LIBRARY, Paper Covers, 20 Cents, Cloth Limp, 50 Cents.

Mrs. Lillie Devereux Blake last evening entertained an audience that filled Frobisher's Hall, in East Fourteenth Street, by a witty and sarcastic handling of the recent Lenten talk of the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix on the follies of women of society.—New York Times.

Mrs. Lillie Devereux Blake is a very eloquent lady, and a thorn in the side of the Rev. Dr. Dix, and gentlemen who, like him, presume to say that woman is not man's equal, if not his superior. Mrs. Blake in her reply to Dr. Dix's recent lecture upon "Divorce," made some interesting remarks upon the sex to which she has the honor to belong.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

There is no denying that Mrs. Blake has, spartan-like, stood as a break-water to the surging flood Rector Dix has cast upon the so-called weaker sex with the hope of engulfing it. It is sad to see a gentleman in the position Dr. Dix occupies setting himself deliberately at work to not only bring reproach upon the female sex, but to make us all look with contempt upon our mothers and sisters. And the worst of his case is that he has shown that spirit in the male part of mankind, which is not at all creditable to it, of depreciating the intellect, the judgment, the ability and the capability of the female sex in order to elevate to a higher plane the male sex. According to Dr. Dix the world would be better were there no more female children born. And he makes this argument in the face of the fact that there would be "hell upon earth" were it not for the influence of women, and such women as Mrs. Lillie Devereux Blake, especially.—Albany Sunday Press.

Mrs. Blake's was the most interesting and spicy speech of the evening. She was in a sparkling mood and hit at everything and everybody that came to her mind.—The Evening Telegram, N. Y.

A stately lily of a woman, with delicate features, a pair of great gray eyes that dilate as she speaks till they light her whole face like two great soft stars.—The Independent, N. Y.

* * * She advanced to the front of the platform, gesticulated gracefully and spoke vigorously, defiantly and without notes.—New York Citizen.

* * * a most eloquent and polished oration. The peroration was a grand burst of eloquence.—Troy Times.

Lillie Devereux Blake, blonde, brilliant, staccate, stylish, is a fluent speaker, of good platform presence, and argued wittily and well.—Washington Post.

There are very few speakers on the platform who have the brightness, vivacity and fluency of Lillie Devereux Blake.—Albany Sunday Press.

She is an easy, graceful speaker, and wide-awake withal, bringing our frequent applause.—Hartford Times.

Mrs. Blake's address was forcible and eloquent. The speaker was frequently interrupted by applause.—New York Times.

The most brilliant lady speaker in the city.—New York Herald.

Has the reputation of being the wittiest woman on the platform.—San Antonio Express.

Mrs. Blake, who has a most pleasing address, then spoke; a strong vein of sarcasm, wit and humor pervaded the lady's remarks.—Poughkeepsie News.

EXTRACTS FROM NOTICES BY THE PRESS.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW —“ If there ever was a book made up from beginning to end of laughter, yet not a comic book, or a ‘merry’ book, or a book of jokes, or a book of pictures, or a jest book, or a tomfool book, but a perfectly sober and serious book, in the reading of which a sober man may laugh without shame from beginning to end, it is the book called Vice Versa; or, a Lesson to Fathers.’ . . . We close the book, recommending it very earnestly to all fathers, in the first instance, and their sons, nephews, uncles, and male cousins next.”

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE.—“ ‘Vice Versâ’ is one of the most diverting books that we have read for many a day. It is equally calculated to amuse the August idler, and to keep up the spirits of those who stay in town and work, while others are holiday making. . . . The book is singularly well written, graphic, terse, and full of nerve. The school-boy conversations are to the life, and every scene is brisk and well considered.”

THE ATHENÆUM.—“ The whole story is told with delightful drollery and spirit, and there is not a dull page in the volume. It should be added that Mr. Anstey writes well, and in a style admirably suited to his amusing subject.”

THE SPECTATOR.—“ Mr. Anstey deserves the thanks of everybody for showing that there is still a little fun left in this world . . . It is long since we read anything more truly humorous. . . . We must admit that we have not laughed so heartily over anything for some years back as we have over this ‘Lesson for Fathers.’ ”

THE ACADEMY.—“ It is certainly the best book of its kind that has appeared for a long time, and in the way of provoking laughter by certain old-fashioned means, which do not involve satire or sarcasm, it has few rivals.”

THE WORLD.—“ The idea of a father and son exchanging their identity has suggested itself to many minds before now. It is illustrated in this book with surprising freshness, originality and force. . . . The book is more than wildly comic and amusing; it is in parts exceedingly pathetic.”

THE COURT JOURNAL.—“ The story is told with so much wit and gayety that we cannot be deceived in our impression of the future career of F. Anstey being destined to attain the greatest success among the most popular authors of the day.”

VANITY FAIR.—“ The book is, in our opinion, the drollest work ever written in the English language.”

TRUTH.—“ Mr. Anstey has done an exceedingly difficult thing so admirably and artfully as to conceal its difficulties. Haven’t for years read so irresistibly humorous a book.”

SCIENCE IN SHORT CHAPTERS

By W. MATTIEU WILLIAMS, F.R.A.S. F.C.S.

Author of "The Fuel of the Sun," "A Simple Treatise on Heat," &c.

BEING No. 80 OF LOVELL'S LIBRARY,

12mo, handsome paper covers, Price, 20 Cents.

"Mr. Mattieu Williams is undoubtedly able to present scientific subjects to the popular mind with much clearness and force; and these essays may be read with advantage by those, who, without having had special training, are yet sufficiently intelligent to take interest in the movement of events in the scientific world."—Academy.

"The title of Mr. Mattieu Williams' 'Science in Short Chapters' exactly explains its subject. Clear and simple, these brief reprints from all sorts of periodicals are just what Angelina may profitably read to Edwin while he is sorting his papers, or trimming the lamps, if (like some highly domesticated Edwins) he insists on doing that ticklish bit of house-work himself."—Graphic.

"The papers are not mere réchauffés of common knowledge. Almost all of them are marked by original thought, and many of them contain demonstrations or aperçus of considerable scientific value."—Pall Mall Gazette,

"The chapters range from such subjects as science and spiritualism to the consumption of smoke. They include a dissertation on iron filings in tea, and they discuss the action of frost on water-pipes and on building materials. The volume begins with an article on the fuel of the sun, and before it is concluded it deals with Count Rumford's cooking stoves. All these subjects, and a great many more, are treated in a pleasant, informative manner. Mr. Williams knows what he is talking about, and he says what he has to say in such a way as to prevent any possible misconception. The book will be prized by all who desire to have sound information on such subjects as those with which it deals."—Scotsman.

"To the scientific world Mr. Williams is best known by his solar studies, but here he is not writing so much for scientists as for the general public. It has been the aim of his life to popularise science, and his articles are so treated that his readers may become interested in them and find in their perusal a mental recreation."—Sunday-school Chronicle.

"We highly recommend this most entertaining and valuable collection of papers. They combine clearness and simplicity, and are not wanting in philosophy likewise."—Tablet.

PROGRESS AND POVERTY.

By HENRY GEORGE.

1 Vol. 12mo., large type, neat paper covers,20

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

Not merely the most original, the most striking and important contribution which political economy has yet received from America, but it is not too much to say that in these respects it has had no equal since the publication of "The Wealth of Nations," by Adam Smith, a century ago.—New York Herald.

Few books have in recent years proceeded from any American pen that have more plainly borne the marks of wide learning and strenuous thought.—New York Sun.

A masterly book. Mr. George is the only man who has not merely put down clearly, in black and white, what are the causes of social disease, but offered a cure.—N. Y. Times.

A courageous thinker, who, though familiar with the learning of the books, follows the conclusions of his own reasoning.—New York Tribune.

If we were asked to name the most important work of the Nineteenth Century, we would name "Progress and Poverty."—New York Era.

The first great economic work in the English language, written from the standpoint and in the interests of the laboring classes.—Irish World.

Progress and Poverty beyond any book of our time deserves careful study.—Brooklyn Times.

It has been subjected to the criticisms of the candid and thoughtful, the exacting and the captious, but all agree that it is an earnest, powerful, courageous and far-reaching work. The author has stated his theories with a clearness of expression, a boldness of thought, and an eloquence of style which have attracted the attention of the most profound philosophers, and the most learned of political economists.—Boston Post.

A book which no public man can afford to omit reading.—Washington Critic.

The most remarkable book of the century in its possible effects upon the course of human events.—Charleston News and Courier.

Every sentence is as clear as a sunbeam; every proposition is as legitimately traced to its logical result as one of Euclid's.—Galveston News.

A trumpet call to a struggle which cannot long be avoided.—Philadelphia Star.

A bold and frank exposition of theories now forcing themselves on public notice.—Chicago Tribune.

Earnest, honest and forcible; radical to the root; bold, sweeping and dogmatic.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"Yolande' will please and interest many."—Whitehall Review.

The LADIES LINDORES. By MRS. OLIPHANT. Originally published in Blackwood's Magazine. 1 vol., 12mo., cloth, gilt, $1.

"She is always readable, but never so entertaining as when she lays the scene in Scotland. It is impossible to imagine sketches more lifelike than those of old Rolls, the pragmatic butler... of Miss Barbara Erskine, the high-spirited, punctilious, but sensible old aunt; of Lord Rintoul, the weakly yet coolly selfish and sensible young lord... of the ordinary young laird John Erskine, and of the most modern of marquises, Lord Millefleurs."—Spectator.

"The Ladies Lindores' is in every respect excellent. There are two girls at least in this book who might make the fortune of any novel, being deliciously feminine and natural."—Saturday Review.

LOYS, LORD BERESFORD, and other Tales. By the Author of "Phyllis," "Molly Bawn," "Mrs. Geoffrey," etc. 1 vol., 12mo., cloth, gilt, $1.00; also in LOVELL'S LIBRARY, No. 126, 1 vol., 12mo., paper cover, 20 cents.

"That delightful writer, the author of 'Phyllis,' has given us a collection of stories which cannot fail to be popular. There is something good in all of them, and one or two are especially racy and piquant."—The Academy.

NO NEW THING. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "Matrimony," "Mademoiselle de Mersac," etc. 1 vol., 12mo., cloth, gilt, $1.00; also in LOVELL'S LIBRARY, No. 108, 20 cents.

"Mr. Norris has succeeded. His story, 'No New Thing,' is a very curious one.... There is unmistakable capacity in his work."—Spectator.

"'No New Thing' is bright, readable and clever, and in every sense of the word a thoroughly interesting book."—Whitehall Review.

ARDEN. By A. MARY F. ROBINSON. 1 vol., 12mo., in LOVELL'S LIBRARY, No. 134, 15 cents.

"Miss Robinson must certainly be congratulated on having scored a success at the very beginning of her career. 'Arden' is an extremely clever story, and though it is one merely of every-day life, yet the incidents are so clothed as to appear fresh and new, and the scent of the hay throughout is invigorating and refreshing. The heroine, who gives her name to the book, is a wild, impulsive creature whom one cannot help liking, in spite of various weaknesses in her character. Brought up in Rome, on the death of her father, Arden returns to his native village in Warwickshire, there to make acquaintance with the truest and freshest country people we have ever met on paper. The story is simply that of Arden's life and marriage, but it is never wearisome because of the sharpness of the writing, and we have to thank Miss Robinson for a very good novel indeed."—Whitehall Review.

BRAIN AND NERVE FOOD.

Vitalized Phos-phites,

COMPOSED OF THE NERVE-GIVING PRINCIPLES OF THE OX-BRAIN AND WHEAT-GERM.

It restores the energy lost by Nervousness or Indigestion; relieves Lassitude and Neuralgia; refreshes the nerves tired by worry, excitement, or excessive brain fatigue; strengthens a failing memory, and gives renewed vigor in all diseases of Nervous Exhaustion or Debility. It is the only PREVENTIVE FOR CONSUMPTION.

It aids wonderfully in the mental and bodily growth of infants and children. Under its use the teeth come easier, the bones grow better, the skin plumper and smoother; the brain acquires more readily, and rests and sleeps more sweetly. An ill-fed brain learns no lessons, and is excusable if peevish. It gives a happier and better childhood.

“It is with the utmost confidence that I recommend this excellent preparation for the relief of indigestion and for general debility; nay, I do more than recommend, I really urge all invalids to put it to the test, for in several cases personally known to me signal benefits have been derived from its use. I have recently watched its effects on a young friend who has suffered from indigestion all her life. After taking the VITALIZED PHOSPHITES for a fortnight she said to me; ‘I feel another person; it is a pleasure to live.’ Many hard-working men and women—especially those engaged in brain work—would be saved from the fatal resort to chloral and other destructive stimulants, if they would have recourse to a remedy so simple and so efficacious.”

EMILY FAITHFULL.

PHYSICIANS HAVE PRESCRIBED OVER 600,000 PACKAGES BECAUSE THEY KNOW ITS COMPOSITION, THAT IT IS NOT A SECRET REMEDY, AND THAT THE FORMULA IS PRINTED ON EVERY LABEL
